PREFACE.

IF New Hampshire did not do as much toward the suppression of the late Great Rebellion as any of her sister States, it was because she is circumscribed in territorial limits and has a smaller population and less wealth than some of the others, and not for want of fidelity to the Union or loyalty to the General Government. What she had was freely placed upon the altar of her country. When the national flag on the ramparts of Sumter was ruthlessly assailed by traitors and the President called upon the State for aid to protect the honor, the rights and property of the government from rebels in arms against them, she acted promptly, energetically, patriotically. Bank vaults and private coffers were thrown wide open and their contents placed at the service of the State authorities; her young men left their farms, factories, workshops, stores, counting-houses, schools and colleges and took up arms with alacrity. They were sent to the field as well armed and equipped for the duties before them as troops from any other State. They fought as often, as bravely, and suffered as much in battle, in the trenches, in camp, hospitals and rebel prisons as those from any other State, and made as little complaint.

To make a history of all the noble and heroic deeds of the brave men of New Hampshire in the field, and the patriotic action of the State, would require many volumes of the size of this one. The author hoped only to give a general view, rather than full details. Influenced by no partiality for any man or organization, he has endeavored to deal justly by all who acted prominent parts in and during the war, so far as his circumscribed limits would permit. If much has been omitted which might rightfully claim a place in this book, great pains have been taken to make its history correct, so far as it goes, and to give credit where credit fairly belongs.

The author is under obligations to many gentlemen for valuable assistance in preparing this book. To Adjutant General Natt Head, for his invaluable Reports covering the period of the war, from which histories of the organization and movements of many of the regiments have been condensed, and other documents—without a free use of which the present work must have been much less perfect than it is. To General John Bedel of the Third; Rev. Stephen G. Abbott, Chaplain of the First; Rev. John W. Adams, Chaplain of the Second ; Colonel Thomas J. Whipple, of the Fourth ; Colonel J. E. Larkin, of the Fifth ; Dr. Sherman Cooper, of the Sixth, and Colonel Robert Wilson, of the Fourteenth, for aid in the preparation of the history of their several regiments. To Hon. Charles H. Bell, of Exeter and J. E. Pecker, of Concord, for contributions. To Colonel John B. Clarke, of the Manchester Mirror, for the use of his files, and to many other gentlemen who have shown interest in the work and extended needed favors.

The portraits presented in this volume are of New Hampshire men who acted their parts in the great tragic drama, at home or in the field, nobly and patriotically. Many others deserve a place here, but for reasons beyond the author's control, could not be obtained.

With all its short-comings and imperfections this book is submitted to the people of New Hampshire, with the hope that at no very distant day a more elaborate and complete history may be written and published of the patriotic action of the State, and of the heroic deeds of her brave troops in the War of the Great Rebellion, than has here been attempted.

THE REBELLION.

PART I.

POSITION OF AFFAIRS PREVIOUS TO AND AT THE TIME OF THE BREAKING OUT OF THE WAR.

FROM the day of the adoption of the Constitution there has been an antagonism between the Northern and the Southern portions of the United States.—That Constitution contains not one word hostile to liberty and humanity. In it, however, is a single phrase which has been interpreted differently by the different sections of the country—"held to labor." At the North, these simple, harmless words mean a hired man, an apprentice. At the South, they mean a slave, feudal bondage, the right of property in man, and all the attendant oppressions and cruelties. From these different constructions of the spirit of the organic law of the country, and the widely different modes of life and of thought, the antagonism between the North and the South has grown with the growth and strengthened with the strength of the nation. Mr. Iverson, of Georgia, in speaking on this subject in the United States Senate, on the 5th of December, 1860, said, "Sir, disguise the fact as you will, there is an enmity between the Northern and the Southern people, which is deep and enduring, and you can never eradicate it—never. . . . We are enemies as much as if we were hostile States. We have not lived in peace. We are not now living in peace. It is not expected that we shall ever live in peace.”

Mr. Mason, of Virginia, in the same debate, said, “This is a war of sentiment and opinion, by one form of society against another form of society.”

Garrett Davis, senator from Kentucky, said, “The Cotton States, by their slave labor, have become wealthy, and many of their planters have princely revenues—from fifty to one hundred thousand dollars a year. This wealth has begot pride, and insolence, and ambition; and those points of the Southern character have been displayed most insultingly in the halls of Congress. As a class, the wealthy cotton growers are insolent, they are proud, they are domineering, they are ambitious. They have monopolized the government in its honors for forty or fifty years, with few interruptions. When they saw the scepter about to depart from them, in the election of Abraham Lincoln, sooner than give up office, and the spoils of office, in their mad and wicked ambition, they determined to disrupt the old Confederation, and erect a new one, wherein they would have undisputed power. Nine out of ten of the Northern people were sound upon the subject. They were opposed to the extension of slavery; and I do not condemn them for that: but they were willing to accord to the slaveholders all their constitutional rights.”

The slaveholders had become arrogant in their demands upon Congress, claiming that the Constitution favored freedom, free labor, and free schools, and that it should be so far changed as to maintain the exclusive claims of an aristocratic class, and to strengthen their hold upon their slaves. They insisted that the domestic slave trade should be nurtured, and the foreign slave trade opened. They demanded the right to extend slavery over all the Territories of the United States; the right to hold their slaves in all the States of the Union temporarily; that speaking or writing against slavery in any State of the Union should be a penal offense; that the North should catch their fugitive slaves, and send them back to bondage; and that the administration of the General Government should be placed in the hands of those only whom the South could trust, as the pledged enemies of republican equality, and the friends of slavery. These were the demands of the South, which, they said, must be acceded to, or they would dash the Union to pieces and from the fragments construct a Confederacy, with slavery for its corner stone.

In the election of Abraham Lincoln to the Presidency, in 1860, the people of the United States said, most emphatically, "We will not accede to these arrogant and wicked demands. We will not thus change the Constitution of our fathers. We will abide by it as it is." In an appeal to the ballot-box the slaveholders were fairly and overwhelmingly defeated, and they determined to secede and break up the Union.

As long ago as 1856, Hon. Preston Brooks, of South Carolina, said, in a speech in Charleston, at an ovation given in his honor, for his brutal assault upon Senator Sumner, of Massachusetts, for words spoken in debate in his place in the Senate, "I tell you, fellow-citizens, from the bottom of my heart, that the only mode which I think available for meeting it [the issue], is just to tear the Constitution of the United States, trample it under foot, and form a Southern Confederacy, every State of which shall be a Slaveholding State."

Mr. Hunter, of Virginia, detailed in the Senate of the United States the changes in the Constitution with which alone the Slaveholders would be satisfied. His demands were:—

1. Congress shall have no power to abolish slavery in the States, or the District of Columbia, or the dockyards, forts, and arsenals of the United States.

2. Congress shall not abolish, tax, or obstruct the slave trade between the States.

3. It shall be the duty of each of the States to suppress combination, within its jurisdiction, for the armed invasion of any other State.

4. States shall be admitted with or without slavery, according to the election of the people.

5. It shall be the duty of the States to restore fugitive slaves, or pay the value of the same.

6. Fugitives from justice shall be deemed those who have offended the laws of the State within its jurisdiction, and shall have escaped therefrom.

7. Congress shall recognize and protect as property, what is held to be such by the laws of any State, in the Territories, dockyards, arsenals, forts, and wherever the United States have exclusive jurisdiction.

Mr. Hunter also demanded that there should always be two Presidents chosen, one by the Slavholding States, and the other by the North, and that no act should be valid unless approved by both Presidents. Thus giving to not more than three hundred thousand slaveholders as much power in the government as to the other thirty millions of population. He also demanded that the United States Supreme Court should consist of ten members, five to be chosen by the little handful of slaveholders, and the other five by the millions of freemen.

To accomplish their purpose, every man at the South was to be compelled, by the reign of terror, to support the cause of the slaveholders. Vigilance committees were organized, the mails were searched, and a system of espionage introduced, such as no despotism on earth ever before equalled. A gentleman from Hinds County, Mississippi, wrote to the editor of the New York Tribune, under date of February 7, 1861:—

“I have lived in this State twenty-five years. Yet if I should say, not openly upon the housetop, but at my own table, among my family and friends congregated there, that I do not consider that the South has any real grievance to complain of, and totally oppose the secession of this or any other State from the Union, my property, my life even, would not be safe an hour. It is very certain that those who are in favor of secession have no more than a bare majority in any of the Southern States. We, the Union men of the South, call on you of the North not to desert us.”

The slaveholders demanded further, in addition to the right of the general extension of slavery, that the laws of the Free States should be so changed as to enable them to hold their enslaved servants at the North temporarily, while, at the same time, they refused to allow a Northern gentleman even to enter their States with a free hired colored servant.

The candidates for President in 1860 were Abraham Lincoln, of Illinois, nominated by the Republican party, who was openly pledged to resist the extension of slavery, while he avowed that Congress had no constitutional right to interfere with slavery in those States where it existed, but that it was both the right and the duty of Congress to prohibit slavery in all the United States Territories. John C. Breckinridge of Kentucky, was the candidate of the slaveholders, pledged to administer the government in the most effectual way to nurture and to give increasing political power to the institution of slavery. Stephen A. Douglas, of Illinois, and John Bell, of Tennessee, were supported by those who wished to effect some compromise, and who were ready, for the sake of avoiding civil war, to make very great concessions to the South.

The election took place on the 6th of November, and the result of the popular vote was, for electors: Lincoln, 1,857,610; Douglas, 1,365,976; Breckinridge, 847,953; Bell, 591,613; giving Lincoln the electoral votes of seventeen out of the thirty-three States; eleven for Breckinridge; three for Bell, and one—Missouri—with three-sevenths of New Jersey, for Douglas.

Mr. Lincoln received the electoral votes of California, 4; Connecticut, 6; Illinois, 11; Indiana, 13; Iowa, 4; Maine, 8; Massachusetts, 13; Michigan, 6; Minnesota, 4; New Hampshire, 5; New Jersey, 4; New York, 35; Ohio, 23; Oregon, 3; Pennsylvania, 27; Rhode Island, 4; Vermont, 5; Wisconsin, 5—180. John C. Breckinridge received the votes of Alabama, 9; Arkansas, 4; Delaware, 3; Florida, 3; Georgia 10; Louisiana, 6; Maryland, 8; Mississippi, 7; North Carolina, 10; South Carolina, 8; Texas, 4—72. Stephen A. Douglas, received the votes of Missouri, 9, and 3 of the 7 votes of New Jersey—12. John Bell received the votes of Kentucky, 12; Tennessee, 12; Virginia, 15—39. Hannibal Hamlin, of Maine, was elected Vice-President, receiving 180 electoral votes, while Joseph Lane received 72, Edward Everett 39, and Herschel V. Johnson 12. The electors chosen in New Hampshire were, John Sullivan, of Exeter; Ebenezer Stevens, of Meredith; David Gillis, of Nashua; Nathaniel Tolles, of Claremont; and Daniel Blaisdell, of Hanover.

On the fifteenth of February, in the presence of the two Houses of Congress, the Electoral votes were officially counted and declared by John C. Breckinridge, the slaveholders' candidate for President, who was at that time Vice-President and the President of the Senate. Amid deadly silence, the result was announced as follows: One hundred and eighty votes were cast for Abraham Lincoln; seventy-two for John C. Breckinridge; thirty-nine for John Bell; twelve for Stephen A. Douglas. This gave to Abraham Lincoln a majority of fifty-seven votes over all the other candidates. Whereupon the Vice-President rising, said, "Abraham Lincoln, of Illinois, having received a majority of the whole number of electoral votes, is duly elected President of the United States for the four years commencing on the 4th of March, 1861. And Hannibal Hamlin, of Maine, having received a majority of the whole number of electoral votes, is duly elected Vice-President for the same term."

This was a day of great excitement in Washington. It was a slaveholding city, in the midst of slaveholding States, and fire-eaters from the South were there in great numbers, and had boldly threatened that the announcement of the vote for President should not be made, and that the government should be broken up in a row. James Buchanan was then President; had been intimidated by the slaveholders, and, if he was not in sympathy with them, had not the courage to prepare to meet and thwart their threats of violence. In that crisis the nation could place but little reliance upon his efficiency, and reposed but little confidence in his patriotism. General Winfield Scott had prepared to meet any emergency that might arise, by drawing to the city a military force and so planting their guns as to sweep the streets at the first outbreak, thus overawing the conspirators; and the day passed quietly, and everything was done with decency and in order.

On the 20th of December, 1860, a convention of a few score of slaveholders in South Carolina, led off in the rebellion, and passed the following resolution:—

"We, the people of the State of South Carolina, in convention assembled, do declare and ordain, and it is hereby declared and ordained, that the ordinance adopted by us in convention, on the 23d of May, in the year of our Lord 1788, whereby the Constitution of the United States of America was ratified, and also all acts, and parts of acts, of the General Assembly of this State ratifying the amendments of said Constitution, are hereby repealed, and that the Union now subsisting between South Carolina and other States, under the name of the United States of America, is hereby dissolved."

In the course of the month of January, 1861, the States of Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, and North Carolina followed, and adopted similar acts of secession to that adopted by South Carolina; and, on the 4th of February, forty-two delegates, representing these seven seceded States, met at Montgomery, Alabama, and proceeded to organize a Southern Confederacy of these, with such others as might subsequently be added, and elected Jefferson Davis, President, and Alexander H. Stephens, Vice-President. On the 18th of the same month, Jefferson Davis was inaugurated President at Montgomery.

President Buchanan's cabinet was composed of slaveholders, and others who favored Southern principles. In November, as soon as the result of the presidential election was known, these men set at work to embarrass and cripple the government, that its capital, forts, arsenals, public property, and munitions of war might easily fall into the hands of the wicked conspirators against the Union. Lewis Cass, of Michigan, was Secretary of State, and tried to persuade the President to take steps to avert the impending calamity, and protect the public property; failing in which, he resigned in December, and was succeeded by Jeremiah S. Black, of Pennsylvania. Howell Cobb, a slaveholder from Georgia, was Secretary of the Treasury. When he entered upon office, the national treasury was in a healthy and prosperous condition. He resigned, and took an office under the conspirators. More than six millions of dollars had been stolen, and, when his successor went into office, the treasury was on the verge of bankruptcy. Jacob Thompson, a Mississippi slaveholder, was Secretary of the Interior, and did all in his power to aid the conspirators. John B. Floyd, a Virginia slaveholder, was Secretary of War.

There was a plan on foot—which, thank God, was discovered in season to thwart it—to assassinate the President elect when on his way to Washington to take his seat. In the panic, which it was supposed would ensue, troops from the adjacent Slave States of Maryland and Virginia were to seize upon Washington and all its treasures, and make it the capital of the new Confederacy. To this end the United States army—but a few thousands in number—was so disposed that the soldiers could not rally to the support of the government, while the arsenals at the North were despoiled, the arms sent to the Slave States, and the fortifications in those States seized and garrisoned by the conspirators. Having accomplished all this, Floyd sent in his resignation, joined the rebels, and was appointed a general in their army. Most of the clerks and employees in the different departments of the government at Washington were in sympathy with the conspirators, and many were actively aiding them in their damnable plots to overthrow the best government that the sun ever shone upon.

Isaac Toucey, of Connecticut, was Secretary of the Navy. According to the report of his successor to Congress, July 4, 1861, our fleet in February, 1861, consisted of ninety vessels of all classes, carrying two thousand four hundred and fifteen guns; and was manned by a complement of about seven thousand six hundred men, exclusive of officers and marines. Notwithstanding the necessity for the presence of this fleet in our own waters to aid the government in this trying hour, it was dispersed, for no good excuse; the Brooklyn, twenty-five guns, and the store-ship Relief, two guns, only remaining, to defend the entire Atlantic coast.

On the 21st of February, 1861, a select committee of five, appointed by the House of Representatives, in a report upon the conduct of the Secretary of the Navy, after stating what disposition had been made of our naval force, said:—

“The committee cannot fail to call attention to this extraordinary disposition of the entire naval force of the country, and especially in connection with the present no less extraordinary and critical juncture of our political affairs. They cannot call to mind any period in the past history of the country, of such profound peace and internal repose, as would justify so entire an abandonment of the coast of the country to the chance of fortune. Certainly since the nation possessed a navy, it has never before sent its entire available force into distant seas, and exposed the immense interests at home, of which it is the especial guardian, to the dangers from which, even in times of the utmost quiet, prudence and forecast do not always shelter them.

“To the committee this disposition of the naval force, at this most critical period, seems extraordinary. The permitting of vessels to depart for distant seas after these unhappy difficulties had broken out at home, the omission to put in repair and commission, ready for orders, a single one of the twenty-eight ships dismantled and unfit for service, in our own ports, and that, too, while $646,639.79 of the appropriation for repairs in the navy, the present year, remained unexpended, were, in the opinion of the committee, grave errors, without justification or excuse.”

THE GREAT REBELLION.

All these, and many other like wicked acts, were being committed under the eye and with the knowledge of President Buchanan, and by officers whom he had the power to displace at any moment, and yet he never raised his hand to prevent or check them.

There were a few leading and influential men in the slave States, slaveholders themselves, who wiser than the rest, were opposed to secession and the disruption of the old Union, but were soon forced to acquiesce in the schemes and movements of the conspirators. They were whipped into the ranks of the rebellion. It was not sufficient for them to remain silent or neutral, but they must be active for treason, or their property and lives were at the mercy of a set of fiends who showed no mercy.

Alexander H. Stephens, for many years a member of the United States House of Representatives from Georgia, and one of the most influential men in that State, opposed secession. In a speech to an immense gathering of his constituents at Milledgeville, on the 14th of November, 1860, he said:—

“The first question that presents itself is, Shall the people of the South secede from the Union in consequence of the election of Mr. Lincoln to the Presidency of the United States? My countrymen, I tell you frankly, candidly, and earnestly, that I do not think that they ought. In my judgment, the election of no man, constitutionally chosen to that high office, is sufficient cause for any State to separate from the Union. It ought to stand by and aid still in maintaining the Constitution of the country. To make a point of resistance to the Government—to withdraw from it, because a man has been constitutionally elected—puts us in the wrong. We are pledged to maintain the Constitution. Many of us have sworn to support it. Can we, therefore, for the mere election of a man to the Presidency—and that, too, in accordance with the prescribed forms of the Constitution—make a point of resistance to the Government, and without becoming the breakers of that sacred instrument ourselves, withdraw ourselves from it? Would we not be in the wrong? Whatever fate is to befall this country, let it never be laid to the charge of the people of the South, and especially of the people of Georgia, that we were untrue to our National engagements. Let the fault and the wrong rest upon others. If all our hopes are to be blasted, if the Republic is to go down, let us be found to the last moment standing on the deck, with the Constitution of the United States waving over our heads. Let the fanatics of the North break the Constitution, if such is their fell purpose. Let the responsibility be upon them. I shall speak presently more of their acts; but let not the South, let us not be the ones to commit the aggression. We went into the election with this people; the result was different from what we wished; but the election has been constitutionally held. Were we to make a point of resistance to the Government, and go out of the Union on that account, the record would be made up hereafter against us.

“But, it is said, Mr. Lincoln’s policy and principles are against the Constitution, and that, if he carries them out, it will be destructive of our rights. Let us not anticipate a threatened evil. If he violates the Constitution, then will come our time to act. Do not let us break it, because, forsooth, he may. If he does, that is the time for us to strike. I think it would be injudicious and unwise to do this sooner. I do not anticipate that Mr. Lincoln will do anything to jeopardize our safety or security, whatever may be his spirit to do it; for he is bound by the constitutional checks which are thrown around him, which, at this time, render him powerless to do any great mischief. This shows the wisdom of our system. The President of the United States is no Emperor, no Dictator—he is clothed with no absolute power. He can do nothing unless he is backed by power in Congress. The House of Representatives is largely in the majority against him. In the Senate, he will also be powerless. There will be a majority of four against him: This, after the loss of Bigler, Fitch, and others, by the unfortunate dissensions of the Democratic party in their States. Mr. Lincoln cannot appoint an officer without the consent of the Senate—he cannot form a Cabinet without the same consent. He will be in the condition of George III. (the embodiment of Toryism), who had to ask the Whigs to appoint his Ministers, and was compelled to receive a Cabinet utterly opposed to his views; and so Mr. Lincoln will be compelled to ask of the Senate to choose for him a Cabinet, if the Democracy of that body choose to put him on such terms. He will be compelled to do this, or let the Government stop, if the National Democratic men—for that is their name at the North—the conservative men in the Senate—should so determine. Then, how can Mr. Lincoln obtain a Cabinet which would aid him, or allow him, to violate the Constitution?

“Why, then, I say, should we disrupt the bonds of this Union, when his hands are tied—when he can do nothing against us?

“I believe in the power of the people to govern themselves when wisdom prevails, and passion is silent. Look at what has already been done by them for their advancement in all that ennobles man. There is nothing like it in the history of the world. Look abroad, from one extent of the country to the other; contemplate our greatness: we are now among the first nations of the earth. Shall it, then, be said that our institutions, founded upon principles of self-government, are a failure?

“Thus far it is a noble example, worthy of imitation. The gentleman (Mr. Cobb), the other night, said it had proven a failure. A failure in what? In growth? Look at our expanse in National power? Look at our population and increase in all that makes a people great! A failure? Why, we are the admiration of the civilized world, and present the brightest hopes of mankind.

“Some of our public men have failed in their aspirations; that is true; and from that comes a great part of our troubles.

“No! there is no failure of this Government yet. We have made great advancement under the Constitution; and I cannot but hope that we shall advance still higher. Let us be true to our cause.”

Early in January, 1861, Georgia passed an act of secession, and joined the other States that had withdrawn from the Union; and in February, Mr. Stephens accepted the office of Vice-President of the new Confederacy, and traversed the Slave States, and exerted all his powers to rouse the people to war against the government of the United States.

The first plan of the rebels was to break up the government of the United States, take possession of its capital, navy yards, armories, arsenals, and fortifications, preparatory for the outbreak. When all this was done it was supposed there would be but a feeble resistance on the part of the people of the North. The government was to be reorganized, with slavery established in all the States and Territories, and Jefferson Davis as its head. All arrangements for carrying out this scheme had been deliberately and carefully made, and were apparently near consummation, before the people of the North could be made to comprehend the possibility of such a movement by any considerable portion of the people of the Slave States.

THE GREAT REBELLION.

One part of this most wicked and damnable plot was to assassinate President Lincoln as he passed through Baltimore, on his way to Washington, to be inaugurated. It was discovered in season, however, to prevent such a great calamity to the country. He left his home at Springfield, Ill., on the 11th of February, accompanied by his family and a few friends. At all the cities and large towns on his route the people assembled and gave him most enthusiastic receptions, and he replied to addresses of welcome at several different places. At Columbus, Ohio, he said :

“I have not maintained silence from any want of real anxiety. It is a good thing that there is no more than anxiety; for there is nothing going wrong. It is a consoling circumstance that, when we look out, there is nothing that really hurts anybody. We entertain different views upon political questions: but nobody is suffering anything. This is a most consoling circumstance; and from it we may conclude that all we want is time, patience, and a reliance on that God who has never forsaken this people.”

At Pittsburgh, Pa., on the 15th, he said :

“Notwithstanding the troubles across the river [the speaker pointing southwardly across the Monongahela, and smiling], there is no crisis but an artificial one. What is there now to warrant the condition of affairs presented by our friends over the river? Take even their own views of the questions involved, and there is nothing to justify the course they are pursuing. I repeat, then, there is no crisis, except such a one as may be gotten up at any time by turbulent men, aided by designing politicians. My advice to them, under the circumstances, is to keep cool. If the great American people only keep their temper both sides of the line, the trouble will come to an end, and the question which now distracts the country be settled, just as surely as all other difficulties, of a like character, which have originated in this Government, have been adjusted. Let the people on both sides keep their self-possession, and, just as other clouds have cleared away in due time, so will this great nation continue to prosper as heretofore."

At Philadelphia he assisted at the raising of the United States flag over Independence Hall, and in reply to an address of welcome, said :

"I have often pondered over the dangers incurred by the men who assembled here, and framed and adopted that Declaration of Independence. I have pondered over the toils that were endured by the officers and soldiers of the army who achieved that Independence. I have often inquired of myself, what great principle or idea it was that kept this confederacy so long together. It was not the mere matter of the separation of the Colonies from the mother-land; but that sentiment in the Declaration of Independence which gave Liberty, not alone to the people of this country, but, I hope, to the world, for all future time. It was that which gave promise that, in due time, the weight should be lifted from the shoulders of all men. This is a sentiment embodied in the Declaration of Independence. Now, my friends, can this country be saved on that basis? If it can, I will consider myself one of the happiest men in the world, if I can help to save it. If it cannot be saved on that basis, it will be truly awful. But, if this country cannot be saved without giving up that principle, I was about to say that I would rather be assassinated on this spot than surrender it. Now, in my view of the present aspect of affairs, there need be no bloodshed or war. There is no necessity for it. I am not in favor of such a course; and I may say, in advance, that there will be no bloodshed, unless it be forced upon the Government, and then it will be compelled to act in self-defense."

The loyal people of Baltimore had made preparations to testify their respect for the President elect, by a large gathering, procession, and other ceremonies, while the conspirators had arranged to get up a riot at the depot, on his arrival, during which the President, unarmed and unprotected, was to be stabbed or shot. This plan was discovered by the police, who informed General Scott and senator Seward, and Frederick W. Seward, son of the senator, was immediately dispatched to meet the President, and inform him of the danger to his life. He had a public reception at Harrisburgh, after which, with a few of his friends, he retired to his private apartments at the hotel about six o'clock in the evening, and as he was known to be weary, was not interrupted. As soon as it was dark, he, in company with Colonel Lamon, unobserved, entered a hack and drove to the Pennsylvania railroad, where a special train was waiting for him. The telegraph wires were in the mean time cut, so that the knowledge of his departure, if discovered or suspected, could not be sent abroad. The train reached Philadelphia at half-past ten o'clock that night. They drove immediately across the city to the Baltimore and Washington depot. The regular night train was just leaving, at a quarter past eleven. They took berths in a sleeping-car, and, without any change, passed directly through Baltimore, and arrived at Washington safely and unexpectedly, at half-past six o'clock next morning, being the 23d of February. Thus was an important part of the scheme of the rebels frustrated, and the proposed attempt to seize the capital prevented by the energy and watchfulness of the friends of the incoming administration.

The conspirators had counted on a divided North, believing there were many friends of their cherished institution here who would join them in their rebellion against the government. Here, again, they made a great mistake; for when the people of the Free States were aware of the wicked plot to break up the Union, and the extent of it, they arose as one man to meet the emergency; and the Northern men, with Southern sympathies, found themselves in a most disgraceful and hopeless minority. And the plan to invade the Northern States had to be abandoned, while General Scott, contrary to the wish of President Buchanan, who seemed to be completely under control of the slave power, had gathered nearly three hundred troops in and about the capital for its protection.

On the retirement of the traitor Floyd from the War Department, Hon. Joseph Holt, of Kentucky, was appointed to fill the place. He cooperated with General Scott in the adoption of vigorous measures for the protection of Washington from the menaced capture by the rebels, which greatly alarmed them. On the 18th of February, Mr. Holt addressed a letter to President Buchanan, in reply to a resolution of the House of Representatives, inquiring into the state of the defenses of Washington, from which the following extracts are made:

“The scope of the question submitted by the House will be sufficiently met by dealing with the facts as they exist, irrespective of the cause from which they have proceeded. That revolution has been distinguished by a boldness and completeness of success rarely equalled in the history of civil commotions. Its overthrow of the Federal authority has not only been sudden and widespread, but has been marked by excesses which have alarmed all, and been sources of profound humiliation to a large portion of the American people. Its history is a history of surprises and treacheries, and ruthless spoliations. The forts of the United States have been captured and garrisoned, and hostile flags unfurled upon their ramparts. Its arsenals have been seized, and the vast amount of public arms they contained appropriated to the use of the captors; while more than half a million of dollars, found in the mint at New Orleans, have been unscrupulously applied to replenish the coffers of Louisiana. Officers in command of revenue cutters of the United States have been prevailed on to violate their trusts, and surrender the property in their charge; and instead of being branded for their crimes, they and the vessels they betrayed have been cordially received into the service of the seceded States."

After reiterating the acts of the conspirators, the information that had reached his department upon the subject, the necessity for immediate and decided action, and telling the President what steps he had taken to save the government from humiliation and disgrace, Secretary Holt closes his letter as follows:

"Already this display of life and loyalty on the part of your administration has produced the happiest effects. Public confidence has been restored, and the feverish apprehension, which it was so mortifying to contemplate, has been banished. Whatever may have been the machinations of deluded, lawless men, the execution of their purposes has been suspended, if not altogether abandoned, in view of preparations, which announce more impressively than words, that this administration is alike able and resolved to transfer in peace to the President elect the authority that, under the Constitution, belongs to him. To those, if such there be, who desire the destruction of the republic, the presence of these troops is necessarily offensive. But those who sincerely love our institutions, cannot fail to rejoice that, by this timely precaution, they have probably escaped the deep dishonor which they must have suffered had the capital, like the forts and arsenals of the South, fallen into the hands of revolutionists, who have found this great government weak, only because, in the exhaustless beneficence of its spirit, it has refused to strike, even in its own defense, lest it should wound the aggressors."

One Breshwood, a Virginian, who was in command of the revenue cutter McLelland, infamously surrendered his vessel to the rebels at New Orleans; and Captain Morrison surrendered the revenue cutter Cass to the rebels at Mobile. The rebels seized Fort Morgan at Mobile, and called upon Lieutenant John N. Maffit, who was in command of the Crusader, which was exposed to the fire of the fort, to surrender his vessel to the "Alabama Navy." The noble lieutenant replied, "I may be overpowered; but in that event, what will be left of the Crusader will not be worth taking." He saved his vessel, which afterwards rendered signal service in the Gulf.

On the 3d of February, 1861, Lieutenant J. H. Hamilton, of South Carolina, ordered Captain Porter to surrender his ship to the rebels. The following is Captain Porter's noble reply: "You, sir, have called upon your brother officers, not only to become traitors to their country, but to betray their sacred trust, and deliver up the ships under their command. This infamous appeal would, in ordinary times, be treated with the contempt it deserves. But I feel it a duty I owe myself, and brother officers with whom I am associated, to reply and state, that all under my command are true and loyal to the 'Stars and Stripes,' and to the Constitution. My duty is plain before me. The constitutional government of the United States has entrusted me with the command of this beautiful ship, and before I will permit any other flag than the 'Stars and Stripes' to fly at her peak, I will fire a pistol into her magazine, and blow her up. This is my answer to your infamous letter."

For a few days before the inauguration, Washington was full of rumors of plots to prevent by violence its consummation. General Scott and Secretary Holt had been bending all their energies to gather a military force sufficient to keep in check, or suppress, if it should show itself, any lawless demonstration, and to insure peace and quiet. An imposing military escort was provided to attend the President to the Capitol, and after the ceremonies, to the White House.

The procession, consisting of civilians, about one thousand regulars, and a considerable force of uniformed militia, escorted the retiring and incoming Presidents, who were in the same carriage, to the Capitol. On the spacious eastern portico of the Capitol a platform had been erected, the space in front of which was occupied by the military. The platform was occupied by the Supreme Court, members of the Senate and House of Representatives, foreign ministers, and an immense crowd of privileged persons. The President elect was introduced by Colonel Edward D. Baker, senator from Oregon, and was received with cheers from but a small share of the thirty thousand persons assembled. Mr. Lincoln, in a clear, firm and penetrating voice, delivered his inaugural address, which closed with the following paragraphs:

“My countrymen, one and all, think calmly and well upon this whole subject. Nothing valuable can be lost by taking time.

“If there be an object to hurry any of you, in hot haste, to a step which you would never take deliberately, that object will be frustrated by taking time; but no good object can be frustrated by it.

“Such of you as are now dissatisfied still have the old Constitution unimpaired, and, on the sensitive point, the laws of your own framing under it; while the new administration will have no immediate power, if it would, to change either.

“If it were admitted that you who are dissatisfied hold the right side in the dispute, there is still no single reason for precipitate action. Intelligence, patriotism, Christianity, and a firm reliance on Him who has never yet forsaken this favored land, are still competent to adjust, in the best way, all our present difficulties.

“In your hands, my dissatisfied fellow-countrymen, and not in mine, is the momentous issue of civil war. The government will not assail you.

“You can have no conflict without being yourselves the aggressors. You can have no oath registered in heaven to destroy the government, while I shall have the most solemn one to ‘preserve, protect, and defend it.’

“I am loath to close. We are not enemies but friends. We must not be enemies. Though passion may have strained, it must not break our bonds of affection.

“The mystic chords of memory, stretching from every battle-field and patriot grave to every living heart and hearthstone all over this broad land, will yet swell the chorus of the Union when again touched, as surely they will be, by the better angels of our nature.”

The oath of office was administered by Chief Justice Taney; the procession was re-formed, and escorted President Lincoln to the White House. Although there were many low threats, open and implied, the arrangements were so admirably made and carried out by the loyal men at the capital, that everything connected with the ceremonies of inauguration passed off without interruption or disturbance.

The next day after his inauguration, President Lincoln submitted to the Senate the names of the gentlemen whom he had appointed as his Cabinet officers, as follows: William H. Seward, of New York, Secretary of State; Salmon P. Chase, of Ohio, Secretary of the Treasury; Simon Cameron, of Pennsylvania, Secretary of War; Gideon Welles, of Connecticut, Secretary of the Navy; Caleb B. Smith, of Indiana, Secretary of the Interior; Edward Bates, of Missouri, Attorney General; Montgomery Blair, of Maryland, Postmaster General.

The rebel capital was established at Montgomery, Alabama. Jefferson Davis had already appointed his Cabinet, as follows: Robert Toombs, of Georgia, Secretary of State; Charles G. Memminger, of South Carolina, Secretary of the Treasury; Leroy Pope Walker, of Alabama, Secretary of War; Stephen R. Mallory, of Florida, Secretary of the Navy; John H. Reagan, of Texas, Postmaster General.

Thus were the two governments organized. President Lincoln and a majority of his Cabinet hoped that all differences between the self-styled Confederate government and the government of the United States would be adjusted without a resort to arms; while Jefferson Davis's government, which by this time had relinquished the idea of a revolution, and set themselves up as independent States, asked only to be let alone, to be allowed to possess all the property of the United States that they had stolen, and to be acknowledged as independent States. While the Confederate States claimed the right to secede from the Union, and set up a government of their own, the government of the United States denied that right, and claimed that they were still part of the Union, and subject to its Constitution and laws.

Major Robert Anderson, with a mere handful of men,—not more than eighty in all,—was placed in charge of the fortifications in Charleston harbor. They mainly tenanted Fort Moultrie,—the older and weaker of them,—being the most convenient to the city; but it could not have been held twenty-four hours against a serious assault. Its garrison was surrounded by a numerous and frowning foe. During the night of the 5th of December, 1860, Major Anderson prudently transferred his entire force to Fort Sumter,—the most impregnable of all the forts in the harbor,—taking such munitions and provisions as he could, destroying the rest, and spiking the guns, so that they could not be used by the rebels against Sumter. This was a great surprise to the rebels, and they complained of it as a breach of faith, as it was alleged that President Buchanan had promised that the military status should not be changed without due notice. On the 27th,—the next day after the evacuation by Major Anderson,—the rebels seized Forts Moultrie and Pickens; and about the same time the Federal arsenal at Charleston, containing many thousand stands of arms and a large quantity of military stores, was seized by the volunteers flocking to that city, by direction of the State authorities. Castle Pinckney, Fort Moultrie, and Sullivan's Island were now occupied by the rebels, and their defenses enlarged and improved, while the custom-house, post-office, and other government buildings were likewise appropriated, without resistance, the Federal officers there all being secessionists, and the palmetto flag raised over them. Iron-clad batteries had been erected in such number as to command all the entrances to Charleston harbor, so that no wooden frigate could pass them, and precluded the possibility of sending reënforcements or supplies to Fort Sumter. The Star of the West was sent from New York with reënforcements and supplies on the 5th of January, which fact was telegraphed by conspirators to their friends in Charleston. She appeared off the bar at Charleston on the 9th, and, when nearing Fort Sumter, was fired upon from Fort Moultrie and Morris's Island, and was struck by one shot. Without communicating with Major Anderson, she put about, and steered for New York. This was the last attempt made to relieve Major Anderson in his most embarrassed condition, until early in April, after the inauguration of the new government, when vessels laden with provisions were sent from New York, and arrived off the bar on the 12th, the day on which fire was opened upon Sumter. The fleet also returned to New York without fulfilling its mission, only having communicated with Major Anderson by signals.

Such was the situation of affairs on the 12th day of April, 1861, when the rebels of South Carolina opened the most wicked and causeless war upon their government ever recorded in history. In the four succeeding years events of immense magnitude and importance transpired, affecting more or less seriously every nook and corner of our widely extended country, and carrying sadness and mourning to almost every fireside in the land.

On the 11th, General Beauregard demanded the surrender of Fort Sumter to the Confederate Government, which Major Anderson declined to do, but suggested that he would very soon be starved out, if supplies were not sent him. General Beauregard then asked of Major Anderson to state at what time he would evacuate Fort Sumter, if unmolested; and was answered that he would do so at noon on the 15th, "should I not receive, prior to that time, controlling instructions from my government, or additional supplies." This reply was not satisfactory; and, at 3.20, A. M., on the 12th, Major Anderson was notified that fire would be opened on Fort Sumter in one hour.

At the appointed moment the bombardment commenced. Fire was almost simultaneously opened from Fort Moultrie, an iron-clad floating battery in the harbor, Cummings Point, and Mount Pleasant. Fifty breaching cannon playing upon the fort, followed by the crashing and crumbling of brick, stone, and mortar, admonished Major Anderson and his small force of seventy true men, that their stay in the fort must be short, unless relieved by a more powerful fleet than our government then possessed. At seven o'clock, after breakfast,—the principal part of which was salt pork,—the command was divided into three reliefs, each in succession to man the guns for four hours. Captain Arthur Doubleday was in command of the first squad, and fired the first gun, which was directed upon Fort Moultrie. Major Anderson had determined to make the best resistance in his power, though fully aware that the fort must soon succumb to the greatly superior force with which he had to contend, while he took the greatest care that his men should be exposed as little as possible to the shot and shells of the enemy, which were falling in every direction around them.

Red-hot shot and bursting shells soon set the wooden barracks on fire, and nearly the whole interior of the fort blazed like a furnace. For thirty-six hours the terrific bombardment continued with but occasional lulls. The garrison in Sumter soon became so exhausted that they could make but a feeble response. The scene inside the fort is described by an eye-witness as follows:—

“The fire surrounded us on all sides. Fearful that the walls might crack, and the shells pierce and prostrate them, we commenced taking the powder out of the magazine before the fire had fully enveloped it. We took ninety-six barrels of powder out, and threw them into the sea, leaving two hundred barrels in it. Owing to a lack of cartridges, we kept five men inside the magazine, serving as we wanted them, thus using up our shirts, sheets, blankets, and all the available material in the fort. When we were finally obliged to close the magazine, and our material for cartridges was exhausted, we were left destitute of any means to continue the contest. We had eaten our last biscuit thirty-six hours before. We came very near being stifled with the dense, livid smoke from the burning buildings. Many of the men lay prostrate on the ground, with wet handkerchiefs over their mouths and eyes, gasping for breath. It was a moment of imminent peril. If an eddy of wind had not ensued, we all probably should have been suffocated. The crashing of the shot, the bursting of the shells, the falling of the walls, and the roar of the flames, made a Pandemonium of the fort. We, nevertheless, kept up a steady fire."

On the afternoon of the second day of the bombardment, Louis T. Wigfall, late a United States senator from Texas, made his appearance in a small boat, with a white flag, and was admitted; and in a conference with Major Anderson and his officers, insisted that further resistance was useless. The fort was on fire, the garrison exhausted, with the Stars and Stripes floating defiantly over the ruins. Another deputation soon arrived, Wigfall having failed to agree with Major Anderson on the terms for a surrender. After some conference, it was agreed that the garrison should surrender the fort, taking with them, as they retired at their leisure, and in their own way, all their individual and company property, their side arms, and their tattered flag, which they were to salute with a hundred guns, before they hauled it down.

The battle ceased; the fire was extinguished, after destroying almost everything combustible in the fort. Next morning, about nine o'clock, the evacuation commenced and the guns of the fort boomed a salute to the lowering flag, which had been so bravely defended against the unequal foe. The garrison marched out of the main gate, preceded by the band, playing "Yankee Doodle" and "Hail Columbia," with the Stars and Stripes floating over them. They embarked on board the United States ship Baltic, and were carried to New York, where they met with an enthusiastic reception.

That seven thousand well drilled men, with all the needed appliances, could overcome seventy, out of provisions,—for they had eaten their last biscuit,—and nearly destitute of ammunition, and with no hope of succor, was regarded by the chivalry of South Carolina as a most wonderful and glorious victory, and as establishing beyond dispute the independence of the Confederacy.

Arrived at New York, Major Anderson dispatched to his government the following report:—

"STEAMSHIP BALTIC, OFF SANDY HOOK, April 18, 1861.

"THE HON. S. CAMERON,

Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

"Sir: Having defended Fort Sumter for thirty-four hours, until the the quarters were entirely burned, the main gates destroyed, the gorge wall seriously injured, the magazine surrounded by flames, and its door closed from the effects of the heat, four barrels and three cartridges of powder only being available, and no provisions but pork remaining, I accepted terms of evacuation offered by General Beauregard (being the same offered by him on the 11th instant, prior to the commencement of hostilities), and marched out of the fort on Sunday afternoon, the 14th instant, with colors flying and drums beating, bringing away company and private property, and saluting my flag with fifty guns.

"ROBERT ANDERSON,

Major First Artillery."

On the next day after the evacuation of Fort Sumter, April 15, President Lincoln issued a call for seventy-five thousand volunteers for three months' service, and called an extra session of Congress to meet on the ensuing 4th of July. The uprising of the freemen of the North was such as the world never witnessed before. The insult to the old honored flag created a feeling of the most intense indignation, and all party lines seemed for the time obliterated, and two parties only had an existence,—those who would destroy the Union, on the one hand, and those who would defend and preserve it, at any cost, on the other.

There were many who believed that the state of feeling which had resulted in an open rebellion of the slaveholders against the government, had been produced by extremists both at the North and the South, instead of attributing the difficulty to its true cause,—the wide difference between a society of educated free men and a society of slaveholders and slaves, where only the few were educated; but there were none in the free States who openly justified the assault upon Fort Sumter.

On the 15th of April the President promulgated the following “PROCLAMATION.

“Whereas, the laws of the United States have been for some time past, and now are, opposed, and the execution thereof obstructed, in the States of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas, by combinations, too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals by law: Now, therefore, I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, in virtue of the power in me vested by the constitution and the laws, have thought fit to call forth the militia of the several States of the Union, to the aggregate number of seventy-five thousand, in order to suppress said combinations, and to cause the laws to be duly executed.

“The details of this object will be immediately communicated to the State authorities, through the War Department. I appeal to all loyal citizens to favor, facilitate, and aid this effort to maintain the honor, the integrity, and existence of our national Union, and the perpetuity of popular government, and to redress wrongs already long enough endured. I deem it proper to say, that the first service assigned to the forces hereby called forth, will probably be to repossess the forts, places, and property which have been seized from the Union. And, in every event, the utmost care will be observed, consistently with the objects aforesaid, to avoid any devastation, any destruction of, or interference with, property, or any disturbance of peaceful citizens of any part of the country. And I hereby command the persons comprising the combinations aforesaid to disperse, and retire peaceably to their respective abodes, within twenty days from this date.

“Deeming that the present condition of public affairs presents an extraordinary occasion, I do hereby, by virtue of the power in me vested by the Constitution, convene both Houses of Congress. The Senators and Representatives are, therefore, summoned to assemble at their respective chambers, at twelve o’clock, noon, on Thursday, the fourth day of July next, then and there to consider and determine such measures as, in their wisdom, the public safety and interest may seem to demand.

“In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

“Done at the city of Washington, the fifteenth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one, and of the independence of the United States the eighty-fifth.

“ ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

“ By the President :

“ WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Secretary of State.”

With this proclamation, was sent from the War Department, to the Governors of the several States, a circular, explaining that the call was for regiments of infantry, or riflemen only, each regiment to be composed of seven hundred and eighty men. They were apportioned to the several States as follows: Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Delaware, Arkansas, Michigan, Iowa, Minnesota, and Wisconsin, one each; Massachusetts, Tennessee, and North Carolina, two each; New Jersey, Maryland, Missouri and Kentucky, four each; Indiana and Illinois, six each; New York, seventeen; Pennsylvania, sixteen; and Ohio, thirteen. These ninety-four regiments would make a total of seventy-three thousand three hundred and twenty men. The residue of the seventy-five thousand was to be furnished by the District of Columbia.

The Governors of the States of Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee, Missouri and Kentucky utterly refused to furnish any men for the purpose named in the proclamation. The response of Governor Harris, of Tennessee, was as follows, and may be taken as a fair sample of the replies from the Governors of all the above-named States:—

“ Tennessee will not furnish a single man for coercion; but fifty thousand, if necessary for the defense of our rights, and those of our brethren.”

Governor Jackson, of Missouri, in reply to the call, said,— “ It is illegal, unconstitutional, revolutionary, inhuman, diabolical, and cannot be complied with. Not one man will the State of Missouri furnish to carry on so unholy a crusade."

Governor Burton, of Delaware, took until the 26th of April to consider the matter, and then replied, that "The laws of this State do not confer upon the Executive any authority allowing him to comply with such requisition."

Governor Hicks, of Maryland, though claiming to be a Unionist himself, and that his State was still in the Union, gave the Union cause but a very cold support when called upon for troops to uphold it. On the 18th of April he issued a proclamation to the people of Maryland, assuring them that he should do all in his power to preserve "the honor and integrity of the State, and to maintain within her limits that peace so earnestly desired by all good citizens." And adding, "No troops will be sent from Maryland, unless it may be for the defense of the national capital."

On the 17th of April, Jefferson Davis, the head of a band of conspirators and rebels, issued a proclamation, authorizing privateers to be fitted out from all parts of the South, to prey upon the commerce of the United States, and this, too, when the North had been robbed by these conspirators of its entire naval force, and had not half a dozen vessels which could be called into our waters to protect our merchant marine.

As a protection against this piratical proclamation, President Lincoln, on the 19th of April, announced the blockade of all ports of the seceded States. As if by magic a naval force sprang into existence, and in less than ninety days over three hundred armed vessels of war were sailing beneath the Stars and Stripes, with brave men upon their decks, ready to avenge any insult to their honored flag.

About this time there was a determination on the part of leading rebels to capture the City of Washington at all hazards. The Richmond Examiner, of April 23d, said, "The capture of Washington City is perfectly within the power of Virginia and Maryland, if Virginia will only make the effort by her constituted authorities. The entire population pant for the onset. Our people can take it; they will take it; and Scott, the arch-traitor, and Lincoln, the beast, combined, cannot prevent it."

It has been conclusively proved that the following was the plot for the capture of the capital of the nation, with all the public property. A conspiracy was formed by leading Virginians, with prominent secessionists in Washington, and a band of traitors of influence and wealth in Baltimore, to accomplish the infamous and cowardly act in the following manner: Virginia did not then pretend to be out of the Union, and was fully represented in both branches of Congress. The Virginians, at the head of between two and three thousand desperate men, were to make a descent upon Harper's Ferry, seize the arsenal there, which contained twenty-five thousand stand of arms, and thus supply themselves with an abundance of weapons and ammunition. They were then to descend the Potomac to Washington, and make a fierce onset in the streets of the city. Traitors there, in strong bands, armed to the teeth, were prepared to receive them. Incendiaries were designated to fire the city at several points. Amid the terror and confusion of this sudden assault, the conspirators were to seize the most important government buildings, and convert them into fortresses, where they could defy any immediate attack from the bewildered government, and whence they could command the city.

While all this was being done, the conspirators in Baltimore were to cut off all communication with the North, by burning bridges, tearing up railways, and seizing the post-office and telegraph stations. Should troops attempt to reach Washington from the North, a mob was to destroy them in the streets of Baltimore. Troops were to rush from the South to the captured city, and occupy all important military stations. Virginia and Maryland were thus to be dragged into secession, and Washington was to be the capital of the Southern Confederacy.

When this damnable plot was discovered, just on the eve of its execution, it seemed almost impossible for the government to thwart it. Washington was filled with traitors and rebels; no reliance could be placed upon the militia; Southern traitors were occupying the most important posts in the army, and the government did not know who could be trusted. The government seemed surrounded with difficulties, from which there appeared to be no way of extrication; and the North, though burning to avenge the insult upon the flag in the unprovoked attack upon Sumter, had not begun to comprehend the extent of the danger to the national capital, and it is doubtful if they do now, or ever will, since the government passed the crisis more easily than the most sanguine had reason to hope it would.

This plot was made known on the 18th of April, confidentially, to the loyal people of Washington, and gentlemen temporarily there, who were known to be friends of the Union. A gentleman who was there, and took part in the transactions, says,—

“A few trusty friends of the government, visitors in Washington, immediately commenced vigorous, but secret measures, to assist the administration in this fearful crisis. They hastened, by committees, to all the hotels, and sought out those known to be true to the Union, informed them of the peril, and appointed a meeting that very evening, in the church in the rear of Willard’s Hotel, where they would not attract attention. Solemnly, and with intense emotion, they administered the oath anew, of fidelity to the national flag, to every one to whom they confided the secret, and then gave to each the pass which would admit him to the church. This work was speedily accomplished, for there was not a moment to be lost, and soon about two hundred men were assembled in the church.

“After listening to a few words of eloquence, which yet burn in the souls of some of the volunteers in that dark night of the nation’s peril, the company formed themselves into the noted ‘CASSIUS M. CLAY BATTALION.’ These noble men, many of whom were among the most distinguished for wealth and position to be found in our land, were enrolled under efficient officers into small patrol parties, and marched all night long through the streets of the city, to guard against incendiaries, and to prevent the assembling of conspirators. They had orders to shoot down promptly any who should resist their authority.”

Another party of three hundred men were also appointed, under General Lane, to go unobserved to the White House, and bivouac in the East Room, ready to give a warm reception to any parties who might make a sudden attack upon the Presidential Mansion. For three weeks the East Room was thus occupied. General Scott promptly took unobserved possession of the Capitol, with a sufficient number of men to maintain a desperate defense, where were deposited great quantities of military stores and provisions. Thus was the White House and the Capitol to be held until troops from the North could fight their way through Maryland for their rescue if besieged. The greatest care was exercised by the government to guard against surprise.

At ten o’clock, on the night of the 19th, Lieutenant Jones, of the United States army, who was in command at Harper’s Ferry, with but forty-three men, received reliable information that Governor Letcher, of Virginia, had sent three thousand State troops, via Winchester, and that they would reach Harper's Ferry in two hours; and that three hundred troops, from Hallstown, were within twenty minutes' march of the arsenal. Combustibles had been previously prepared, and everything in readiness to blow up the arsenal and other buildings of the armory, should he find the enemy coming upon him in overwhelming numbers. In a trice the torch was applied, and the buildings were all in a blaze, and Lieutenant Jones, with his forty-three men, retreated across the bridge into Maryland, and, after marching all night, reached Carlisle, Pennsylvania, where they were safe from attack from the traitors. The secessionists at the Ferry rushed to the arsenal, and vainly attempted to extinguish the flames. In their rage, they pursued the heroic band, and, firing upon them, killed two of their number. Before morning nearly five thousand Virginia troops were in possession of the ruins at Harper's Ferry.

On the 17th of April, a convention in Virginia secretly passed an ordinance of secession, which was for a time kept from the knowledge of the community, that more effectual measures might be adopted for seizing the government property and fortifications in that State, though a private messenger was sent to inform the Confederate government of the action of the convention.

Government property, to the amount of many millions of dollars, was accumulated at Norfolk Navy Yard, including machine-shops, founderies, store-houses, together with immense amounts of naval and military stores, the whole estimated as worth over nine millions of dollars. The new steam-frigate Merrimac, the Pennsylvania, the largest line-of-battle ship in the world, the Germantown, the Dolphin, and other war vessels, were floating in the harbor. By order of Governor Letcher, on the night of the 16th of April, a large number of boats, laden with stone, were sunk in the channel, so that these large vessels could not pass out, and arrangements were made for seizing the yard. Captain McCaulay, who was in command of the yard, and most of the sub-officers were traitors.

It became evident that the yard could not be held, but that it must fall into the hands of the rebels, and it was determined to destroy it; and the steamship Pawnee was sent from Fortress Monroe to aid in the work. When she appeared at Norfolk, she met with a most enthusiastic welcome from the crews of the Pennsylvania, and other war vessels lying there. The Pawnee arrived, and made fast to the dock at Norfolk about nine o'clock on the evening of the 21st of April, immediately landed her troops, and seized the gates of the yard, so that no traitors could enter. Everything of value was removed from the Pennsylvania. What could not be removed was thrown overboard, and every preparation made for a great conflagration. At four o'clock next morning, all the men from the yard, except a few left to fire the trains, which had been carefully laid, were taken on board the Cumberland and Pawnee, and the former took the latter vessel in tow. At a given signal the torch was applied, and everything combustible, including the Pennsylvania and several other war vessels, was destroyed.

To put down this well-planned and most wicked rebellion, the North, as one man, nobly responded to the call of President Lincoln for troops. On the evening of the eighteenth, four hundred Pennsylvania volunteers reached Washington. On the same day the Sixth Regiment of Massachusetts volunteers left Boston for Washington, and arrived at Baltimore on the 19th, where they were joined by a regiment from Philadelphia. The Philadelphia regiment was without arms, and the Sixth Massachusetts was but partially armed.

In passing from one railroad station to another in Baltimore, a distance of two and a half miles, the cars had to be drawn by horses. The Massachusetts and Philadelphia troops occupied seventeen cars. The five foremost cars, containing a portion of the Massachusetts troops, were sent forward. There being no horses for the other cars, the residue of the regiment, of whom but a small portion were armed, left the cars and formed in the street, waiting the arrival of horses. None came, for a secession mob which filled the streets had covered the track immediately behind the cars which had been sent forward, with heavy timbers, anchors, stones, and other obstructions, to prevent the passage of the other cars. The residue of the regiment were assailed by the mob with showers of stones and other missiles, hurled from the streets and house-tops, and several soldiers were knocked down and badly injured. In the confusion, one of the rioters stepped up behind a young soldier, seized his gun, and shot him dead. At this the soldiers were ordered to fire, and those who had loaded muskets obeyed the order, with some effect, which caused the mob to recoil. The soldiers, learning that the track had been obstructed, commenced their march from the Camden to the Washington depot, surrounded and followed by the mob, preceded by Mayor Brown and a strong detachment of police. The mob closed in, and attempted to cut off a portion of the rear, which being hardly pressed was ordered to fire, which they did. Several volleys were fired by a small portion of the regiment, killing eleven and wounding four of the rioters. Three soldiers were killed and eight seriously injured. The Massachusetts regiment finally reached the Washington depot, and were sent forward to the city of Washington. The train was repeatedly fired at from the hills and woods along the route, but, providentially, no one was injured. The Philadelphia regiment having no arms, after a severe hand-to-hand fight with the mob, returned to that city.

The telegraph wires connecting Baltimore and the free States were cut, and the railroad bridges northward and north-westward from Baltimore, on the railroads to Philadelphia and Harrisburg, were burned, thus shutting off Washington from all communication with the Northern States. In the mean time, however, the North was making all possible haste in enlisting, arming, equipping, and making ready for the field her noble and patriotic sons.

ACTION OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

PART II.

THE people of New Hampshire, in common with those of New England, and all the free States, were aroused to their utmost by news of the assault upon Fort Sumter. The feeling of indignation was intense. The flag of the common country had been assaulted by insurgents in a State that claimed the right to secede from the Union so dear to every loyal citizen of the country. A war had been commenced upon the Government of the United States by South Carolina, and it only remained for the loyal North to accept the situation. Party lines were for the time forgotten, and men, without scarcely an exception, were ready to do their utmost to protect and sustain the Government. The Capital of the Nation was in danger of capture by the rebels, and troops must be sent, without delay, to defend it from their threatened attacks.

New Hampshire had no organized militia that could be called into active service. The enrollment required by law had been so imperfect that no fair and equal draft could be made upon her citizens liable to be called into active service, in case of insurrection at home or invasion from abroad, and it only remained for the Governor to call for volunteers to fill the quota of the State—one regiment of 780 officers and men—under the call of the President for seventy-five thousand troops for three months' service.

Immediately upon the receipt by telegraph of President Lincoln's Proclamation, Ichabod Goodwin, then Governor, issued the following order :

STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Concord, April 16, 1861. }

To JOSEPH C. ABBOTT, Adjutant and Inspector-General of the New Hampshire Militia :

SIR: The President of the United States having, in pursuance of the act of Congress approved February 28, 1795, called upon the State of New Hampshire for a regiment of militia, consisting of ten companies of infantry, to be held in readiness to be mustered into the service of the United States for the purpose of quelling insurrection and supporting the government :

I, ICHABOD GOODWIN, Governor of New Hampshire, command you to make proclamation, calling for volunteers from the enrolled militia of this State, to the number required, and to issue from time to time all necessary orders and instructions for enrolling and holding in readiness to be mustered into the service of said volunteer corps, agreeably to the aforesaid requisition.

ICHABOD GOODWIN,
Governor and Commander-in-Chief.

By the command of the Governor,

THOMAS L. TULLOCK, Secretary of State.

The foregoing was succeeded immediately by the following:

STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE, }
Concord, April 16, 1861. }

GENERAL ORDER, }
No. 6. }

In pursuance of a proclamation by the President of the United States, the Governor of this State, in a proclamation dated at Concord this day, has ordered the enlistment of one regiment of infantry within the State of New Hampshire, to be held in readiness for service whenever called for.

The regiment will consist of one Colonel, one Lieutenant-Colonel, one Major, one Adjutant, one Quartermaster, one Quartermaster-Sergeant, one Paymaster, one Surgeon, one Surgeon's Mate, one Chaplain, one Sergeant-Major, one Drum-Major, and one Fife-Major.

Each company will consist of one Captain, one First Lieutenant, one Second Lieutenant, four Sergeants, four Corporals, two Musicians, and sixty-four Privates.

The officers of the volunteers will be commissioned according to the laws of the State of New Hampshire.

None under the rank of commissioned officers will be received who are under the age of eighteen or over the age of forty-five.

Volunteers who shall be accepted will be uniformed, armed and equipped at the expense of the State, and their pay will be the same as that of the corresponding rank in the army of the United States.

Any military company at present existing, or any number of citizens desirous of associating for the support of the laws and the defense of their country, or any individual desirous of entering upon the service of the United States, are requested to report themselves to this Department forthwith.

By order of His Excellency, the Governor and Commander-in-Chief.

JOSEPH C. ABBOTT,

Adjutant and Inspector-General.

To raise the regiment called for from New Hampshire by the President's proclamation, in the shortest possible time, enlistment papers were immediately issued by the Adjutant-General for twenty-eight stations, in different parts of the State, and offices were opened for the enlistment of soldiers for three months' service. Col. Henry O. Kent, of Lancaster, Major Frank S. Fiske, of Keene, and Col. Jeremiah C. Tilton, of Sanbornton, were appointed aids to the Adjutant General, to assist in obtaining the requisite number of men, and send them to rendezvous at Concord, as soon as practicable. Daily reports were required to be made by the several enlisting officers to the Adjutant-General, of the number of men enrolled by each, with other needed information. The greatest activity and enthusiasm was manifested in every part of the State, and almost every farm, workshop and business establishment within her borders, sent forth its representative to the field.

While the men were engaged in the work of raising soldiers, the women organized and were making flannel shirts, drawers and other articles for the comfort of the soldiers in the field, and gathering linen and winding bandages for hospitals. Every individual felt that there was a duty to perform in the emergency in which the country was placed by the action of South Carolina and other seceded States of the old Union. Public meetings were called in every considerable town, which were largely attended by men and women; patriotic speeches were made and measures taken to encourage enlistments, and funds pledged by individuals and towns to assist the families of those who should go to the field.

It appearing by reports from the different recruiting stations that men enough had been enlisted to fill the regiment, orders were issued on the 24th of April to take them to Concord, where a camp was established, and Col. John H. Gage, of Nashua, was ordered to assume command. The camp was upon the Fair Grounds of the Merrimack County Agricultural Society, about a mile east from the State House. Col. Gage called it "Camp Union," by which name it was afterwards known.

Men were brought in by companies and squads from every part of the State, and it was soon found that more than enough had assembled to fill the regiment called for, when it was determined by the State authorities to organize, arm, equip, and make ready for the field, and hold subject to orders from the War Department at Washington, two regiments, of seven hundred and eighty officers and men each. To this end, after a partial organization of the first regiment, the residue of the men were sent to Portsmouth, with a view to placing a portion of them in Fort Constitution to garrison that post, which was deemed of importance to the security of the sea-coast of the State. Brigadier General George Stark, of Nashua, was ordered to Portsmouth to take charge of the men and the preliminary organization of the second regiment, and arrived there on the 30th of April. Col. Henry O. Kent, of Lancaster, was placed in charge of the Quartermaster Department. The camp at Portsmouth was named "Camp Constitution."

The following is the whole number of men enlisted for three months, between the 17th of April, when the first papers were issued, and the 30th of the same month, with the places where they were enlisted and the names of enlisting officers. This will show that New Hampshire, though with no organized militia which could be placed immediately under the orders of the War Department, like Massachusetts and some of the other States, was not behind them in zeal and devotion to the cause of the country :

Soon after the arrival of the men at Portsmouth, and before the organization of the second regiment was completed, orders were received by the Governor from the War Department to hold in readiness for its call one regiment only of three months' men; and to enlist, organize, arm, equip, and make ready for service one regiment, of ten hundred and forty-six officers and men, for three years, or during the war.

On the 19th of May, by direction of the Governor, a general order was issued, directing that the opportunity to enlist in the three years' regiment should be offered first to the three months' men assembled in the camp at Portsmouth. Enlistment papers were accordingly distributed on the 21st, and four hundred and ninety-six of those men who had enlisted for three months, immediately re-enlisted for three years, or during the war, as follows:

The men thus re-enlisted, having left their business, families and homes, for an absence of three months only, were given furloughs of from three to six days, to enable them to make arrangements for such absence as their new enlistment involved. The remainder of the men enlisted for three months, were then carefully examined by a surgeon, a portion of them discharged for disability, others at their own request, 274 sent to Fort Constitution, in Portsmouth harbor, to serve out their term of enlistment, and 38 returned to Camp Union, Concord.

Orders had been sent to different recruiting stations to enlist men to fill up the three years' regiment, and on the 26th of May they began to arrive at Camp Constitution. Between the 26th and 30th the following reported to Gen. Stark:

The regiment was soon filled to its maximum number, 1046, by enlistments, and the work of organizing, officering, uniforming, arming, equipping, drilling and making it ready for orders from the War Department, was prosecuted with commendable vigor.

When the men were being enlisted for these two regiments, no one either north or south, however well informed, seemed to appreciate in the smallest degree the magnitude of the war that had been begun at Fort Sumter. Many, and indeed most men, believed that before our men could be made ready for marching orders the rebels would abandon their mad schemes, by the operation of the sober second thought, return to their homes, and that the service of the 75,000 three months' troops called for by the President, would not be required; and hardly any one believed that the two sections of the country would meet in deadly conflict. A few weeks only were required to prove how fallacious were all speculations upon the subject, and how little the people of one section of the country knew of the temper and disposition of the people of the other section.

FIRST REGIMENT.

THE men rendezvoused at Concord were placed in hastily constructed barracks, given plenty of clean straw for bedding, and made as comfortable as circumstances would admit, though they had to wait some days for blankets and other needed articles, with which they were afterwards supplied. Their sleeping accommodations were very different from what they had been accustomed to at home. They submitted with good grace to what seemed an imperative necessity, and made themselves merry over their beds and sleeping apartments. One man from Newport, who had been a stage-driver for many years, and was somewhat famous in that vicinity as a careful, skillful and jolly whip, sent to a fellow stage-man the following message: "I want you to send me a fork to pitch up my bedding."

These men were many of them from the best families in the State, and enlisted out of motives of pure patriotism. The country needed their services, and they gave them with alacrity. No bounties were offered, and the pay to which they were entitled was the same as that of private soldiers in the regular army—eleven dollars per month.

The men began to arrive in camp on the 24th of April, and were soon organized into squads and companies, temporarily for the purpose of drill, and men designated to instruct them, the camp being under the command of Col. John H. Gage, of Nashua, who was a year, or two afterwards killed by the accidental discharge of a gun, while out hunting. The regiment was permanently organized as follows:

Colonel, Mason W. Tappan, of Bradford.

Lieut. Colonel, Thomas J. Whipple, of Laconia.

Major, Aaron F. Stevens, of Nashua.
 Adjutant, Enoch Q. Fellows, of Sandwich.
 Quartermaster, Richard N. Batchelder, of Manchester.
 Paymaster, Moses K. Hazelton, of Bradford.
 Surgeon, Alpheus B. Crosby, of Hanover.
 Asst. Surgeon, Henry C. Shaw, of Hanover.
 Chaplain, Stephen G. Abbott,* of Bradford.
 Sergt. Major, George Y. Sawyer, of Nashua.
 Quartermaster Sergt., Albert Lull, of Milford.
 Fife Major, Francis H. Pike, of Manchester.
 Drum Major, William Carr, of Concord.

The Company officers were as follows :

Co. A, Captain, Louis Bell, of Farmington; First Lieut., George W. Colbath, of Dover; Second Lieut., Oliver M. Clark, of Dover.

Co. B, Captain, Daniel R. Kenney, of Sandwich; First Lieut., Charles W. Sawyer, of Dover; Second Lieut., Joseph W. Wallace, of Dover.

Co. C, Captain, John L. Kelley; First Lieut., Martin V. B. Richardson; Second Lieut., Charles O. Jennison, all of Manchester.

Co. D, Captain, Ira McL. Barton; First Lieut., Edward Nettleton; Second Lieut., Dexter G. Reed, all of Newport.

Co. F, Captain, Augustus S. Edgerly; First Lieut., George W. Handley; Second Lieut., George W. Whipple, all of Nashua.

*Most of the material facts of which the history of this regiment is composed have been furnished by Rev. Stephen G. Abbott, its worthy Chaplain. In some parts of it his language is used, and in others it is the author's, as the case seemed to require.

Co. G, Captain, Andrew J. Sargent, of New London; First Lieut., Horace T. H. Pierce, of Keene; Second Lieut., Charles H. Drummer, of Keene.

Co. H, Captain, Jeremiah D. Drew, of Salem; First Lieut., John M. Clark, of Salem; Second Lieut., Israel L. Drew, of Lawrence, Mass.

Co. I, Captain, Edward E. Sturtevant; First Lieut., Henry W. Fuller; Second Lieut., Enoch W. Goss, all of Concord.

Co. K, Captain, Gilman E. Sleeper, of Salem; First Lieut., Enoch Q. Fellows, of Sandwich; Second Lieut., Hollis O. Dudley, of Manchester.

COLONEL MASON W. TAPPAN.

Colonel Tappan is a son of the late Weare Tappan, for many years a lawyer at Bradford, and died in 1866. Mason was born at Newport, Sullivan County, October 20, 1817, and at an early age removed with his family to Bradford, in Merrimack County, where he has since resided. He fitted for college, studied law with his father and Hon. George W. Nesmith, of Franklin, now one of the judges of the Supreme Judicial Court, and was admitted to the Bar in 1841.

Colonel Tappan acted with the Free Soil, American and Republican parties, each in their turn. Although the town of Bradford was largely democratic, such was his personal popularity with his fellow-townsmen that he was elected to the Legislature successively in 1853, 1854 and 1855, and was one of the most prominent, industrious and able members of the House. He was a candidate for Speaker of the House in 1854, and notwithstanding there was a democratic majority in that body of about twenty, came within two votes of an election. The same year he was nominated by the Whigs, Free Soilers, Independent Democrats and Americans for member of Congress from the Second District, and was elected in March, 1855. He was twice re-elected, and served in the 34th, 35th and 36th Congresses, with marked ability, and to the acceptance of his constituents. In the 34th and 35th Congresses he served upon the Judiciary Committee, and in the 36th was chairman of the Committee on Claims.

In July, 1856, Col. Tappan made an able speech, the House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, upon the subject of the extension of slavery into Kansas, which was listened to with marked attention. The following is its closing paragraph :

“In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, let me say that we seek no quarrel with our brethren of the South. This is an issue which they have forced upon us, and, with God’s blessings, we will meet it as becomes worthy descendants of patriotic sires! You sometimes tell us that you want to be let alone. That is precisely what we intend to do. We will interfere with none of your rights. Whatever is ‘nominated in the bond,’ that we will yield. In turn, is it too much for us to make the same request of you—that you will let us alone? If Slavery be a blessing, to you shall inure all its benefits. If it be a curse, do not ask to place it upon our soil—to involve us in its guilt. We desire to cultivate the relations of peace and of fraternal kindness with the people of the South.”

In March, 1858, Col. Tappan delivered another able speech in the House upon Slavery Agitation, Nullification, and the Lecompton Constitution, in which he said he wished “to put on record the protest of New Hampshire against what I conceive to be the most stupendous political fraud that was ever before attempted to be perpetrated upon any people!”

In the 36th Congress, in the winter of 1860–61, Col. Tappan was placed upon the celebrated select committee of thirty-three—one from each State—to whom was referred so much of the President's annual message as related to the then disturbed state of the country, and joined with C. C. Washburn, of Wisconsin, in a minority report. The majority had agreed to and submitted a report to the House, recommending amendments to the Constitution which would give to the South all and more than they had claimed for their peculiar institution. The minority report was an able document, and concluded with recommending the adoption by the House of the following resolution, which was the same as had been offered in the Senate by Mr. Clark, of New Hampshire :

“ Resolved, That the provisions of the Constitution are ample for the preservation of the Union, and the protection of the material interests of the country ; that it needs to be obeyed rather than amended ; and our extrication from present difficulties is to be looked for in efforts to preserve and protect the public property and enforce the laws, rather than in new guarantees for particular interests, or compromises or concessions to unreasonable demands.”

When the minority report was submitted, on the 5th of February, 1861, Mr. Tappan made a speech in the House, defending in an eloquent and forcible manner the position he and his associate, Mr. Washburn, had taken. He declared it as his belief that no compromise measures could be adopted by Congress which would appease the fury of the South or be productive of any good. He also declared his faith in the patriotism of the mass of the people of the country and in the Constitution to carry the nation safely through the crisis then pending. These positions were justified by subsequent events.

Col. Tappan was appointed by members of the House of Representatives on the Vigilance Committee at Washington, the latter part of the winter of 1861, when the very atmosphere of that locality seemed charged with treason, and was most zealous and active in watching the movements of rebels resident and temporarily there plotting the destruction of the Capital and our national existence.

On the call of President Lincoln for 75,000 volunteers for three months, Col. Tappan was one of the first men in the State to enlist. When the First Regiment was being organized, he was regarded by almost everybody who knew him as the proper person to take command of it, and was accordingly appointed and commissioned Colonel by Gov. Goodwin. As a commander he was patriotic, brave, thoughtful of and kind to his officers and men, and respected by all. He returned to the State with his regiment at the expiration of its term of enlistment, and was mustered out with it. Afterwards, when Col. Whipple resigned the command of the Fourth Regiment, it was offered by Gov. Berry to Col. Tappan, but he declined it for the reason that it would be unjust to Lieut. Col. Bell and other officers of the regiment. He did not again enter the army. As the subsequent regiments were organized the command of them was earnestly sought by scores of good and patriotic men, while Col. Tappan modestly waited the call of his country.

Since the close of the 36th Congress, when his third term in the House of Representatives expired, Col. Tappan has devoted himself assiduously to the practice of his profession, and is regarded as among the first lawyers in the State, both as counselor and advocate. He has taken an active part in nearly every political canvass in the State for the last fifteen years, delivering many eloquent and effective speeches upon pending issues.

As a citizen, a neighbor writes of him: "Mr. Tappan's kindness to the poor and afflicted; his fidelity as a friend; his sensitiveness of heart, and his honor in his profession, are proverbial among his most intimate acquaintances."

From the 1st to the 4th of May the First Regiment was mustered into the service of the United States. The State uniformed and equipped the officers, and supplied the regiment with tents, camp equipage of almost every description, sixteen thorough built four-horse baggage wagons, a two-horse ambulance, and excellent horses and harnesses for the whole; medical stores, surgical instruments, provisions, etc., sufficient to enable the men to support themselves for weeks, if necessary.

Thus equipped the regiment embarked on board the cars at Concord, on the morning of the 25th of May, bound for the seat of war. The train consisted of eighteen passenger cars and the same number of freight cars. The novelty of the event, together with the anxious and tender solicitude of friends, drew together a great crowd to witness the departure. The masses which packed the area, swaying to and fro at every movement; the groups of friends with hearts wildly beating against each other as they exchanged parting embraces and kisses; the sobs and cries that bespoke the tender affection of mothers, sisters, wives and loved ones; the deep sympathy that came welling up from all hearts and betraying itself in the anxious and tearful countenance; all this in strange contrast with the boisterous shouting and laughing of the soldiers—some of which might be traced to recklessness, but much more to a desperate attempt to maintain their courage and cheerfulness—together with the rousing cheers of the multitude as a final farewell, were prominent features in the picture, which will not soon fade from the memory of those who witnessed the scene, and especially those who were actors in it.

The progress of the regiment thence onward was one continued ovation through all the inhabited portions of the route. Every house displayed its flag; the husbandmen left their fields to give them words of cheer; in villages and thickly settled districts the roadsides were lined with the inhabitants—men, women and children, vieing with each other in their sentiments of honor and words and deeds of encouragement. At Worcester, Mass., the citizens provided a magnificent entertainment in Mechanics' Hall, spread upon tables sufficient to accommodate the entire regiment. This favor was most opportune and was gratefully remembered by the soldiers during their campaign. Leaving Worcester the regiment proceeded by the Sound route to New York, arriving there on Sunday morning, May 26th, and enjoyed the hospitalities of the city. The soldiers were entertained at the Arsenal, and a sumptuous dinner was provided for the officers at the Astor House.

The Sons of New Hampshire in New York, numbering four hundred and fifty, met at the Brandreth House, at half-past seven o'clock in the morning, and organized by choosing Charles L. Frost, chairman, and John P. March, Secretary, and marched to the steamboat wharf to meet the regiment. On this occasion and before the arrival of the boat, impromptu speeches were made by Dr. W. M. Chamberlain, H. B. Perkins and Judge Peabody. It was also resolved that they should form an association for the relief of New Hampshire soldiers, and that the families of the troops should be cared for in the absence of their protectors, all present pledging themselves to carry out the project to the fullest extent. A committee, styled a Committee of Aid and Correspondence, was appointed, and consisted of the following gentlemen: Robert Colby, New London; W. M. Chamberlain, Hanover; John P. March, Rochester; Charles E. Soule, Exeter; Levi P. Morton, Bristol; George E. Mendum, Portsmouth; L. L. Britton, Orford; George H. Moore, Concord; John L. Hanson, Dover. The steamers arrived between nine and ten o'clock, and while the men were disembarking, Fred A. Briggs, of Claremont, then clerk at the LaFarge House, was raised upon some cotton bales and ordered to lead the singing of "America" and "Old Hundred," which he did with spirit, while the whole Association sung most enthusiastically. They sung and cheered until they were hoarse, and as Col. Tappan passed by them at the head of his troops the excitement was intense. A procession was formed under the marshalship of Sidney Webster, and the entire body marched to the Brandreth House, where a beautiful silk flag was presented to the regiment by Judge Bonney, in the following speech:

"FELLOW CITIZENS AND SOLDIERS OF NEW HAMPSHIRE:—We, natives of the Granite State, desire to welcome you to the metropolis. It is not our place to inquire why you are here. We all know that in time of old, when the liberty of the country, and the people was in danger, New Hampshire sent a large number of men to the support of the government. We know that when the Constitution was subsequently in danger, and when it was sought to be violated in the halls of the Legislature, New Hampshire sent forth expounders ablest of them all. And now, when the cry has gone forth that the country is in danger and the Constitution unsafe, New Hampshire comes to the rescue as of old, and says the Union and the Constitution shall be maintained. (Cheers). Soldiers, you are going to fight a great fight—fight in a great cause, and for great principles. It is to be determined now whether man is capable of self-government, and whether we have a government at all. We know that when you meet danger you will meet it as your forefathers did—without fear. We of the Granite State desire to present you with this banner, to be borne in the struggle. It bears no strange or unusual device. It is the old Stars and Stripes, the device of our fathers, grown broader and broader every year as a new star has been added to the glorious constellation. It is that untarnished flag which has never suffered dishonor or humiliation, and which was only lowered at Sumter by the odds of seven thousand men against seventy. To your hands we intrust the banner, feeling secure that it will be nobly borne, and that the words of General Dix: ‘If any man attempts to haul down that flag, shoot him on the spot,’ will ever accompany it. This is not the time for talking. We will present you with the flag, and bid you ‘Onward—God speed.’ Those whom you have left behind you, and those you see around you, will come to your aid if you ever should call for assistance, and to this end we all pledge ourselves.”

Colonel Tappan replied in a neat and appropriate speech, substantially as follows:

“Sons of New Hampshire in New York, I have not words to thank you for the kind manner in which you have greeted us. It is but natural for us, who have recently left our homes and bid adieu to all the ties which bind us there, to receive gratefully the kind attentions which have been manifested during our travels. In fact, our progress all along the route has been a continued ovation. These manifestations of a free people show how plainly is the determination to maintain the Union in all its integrity. But none of these manifestations are more grateful than the one to-day. I will take this beautiful flag, and promise that you will never have occasion to regret that you gave it to us—that it never will be tarnished by this regiment, but that every man will rally to its protection. We know that this may be no holiday affair; but we have counted the cost. It is, as you say, no time to inquire what we are here for. It is to be determined whether one State, or seven States, can secede and break up the most glorious government ever devised by man. (Loud cheers.) That flag shall never be dishonored, I can assure you, gentlemen.”

The flag was paid for by subscription from the friends of New Hampshire men in New York City. The amount of subscription was put at three dollars, and no greater sum was received from any one person.

A New York paper, in giving an account of the passage of this regiment through that city, said: “Accompanying the troops were one hundred and sixteen horses, sixteen baggage wagons, containing tents and provisions for thirty days, and one hospital wagon. There were also in attendance sixteen nurses, who took dinner at the Astor House. The troops were dressed in a gray uniform, and armed with Springfield muskets of 1847 pattern. In point of equipage no body of soldiers was ever better provided for; and as for fighting material, they even excelled the Sixty-Ninth (Irish) regiment of this State.”

The burial of Col. Ellsworth, of the New York Fire Zouaves, who was shot at the Marshall House, Alexandria, Va., on the 24th, when taking down a rebel flag, occurred on this day, and the funeral procession was so extended as to baffle repeated attempts to pass through the city to Jersey ferry, and the regiment was obliged to stand on the street until its entire length had passed.

The regiment proceeded to Baltimore by railroad, arriving there about four o'clock in the afternoon of Monday, the 27th of May. This was the great point of interest to all as the scene of the first blood shed in the rebellion. The men disembarked from the cars and were kept waiting nearly two hours for the baggage train. Perfect order and quiet prevailed, though the streets were thronged with citizens. Many words of cheer were quietly spoken; water and refreshments were distributed; one large flag was stretched across the street and many small ones were flying from the windows, and occasionally a lady was seen waving her handkerchief. With these exceptions the calm was evidently that of a spirit under the restraint of fear. The Manchester Cornet Band, which was attached to the regiment, played the first national air in that city after the murderous assault upon the Massachusetts Sixth. It was "Yankee Doodle," and they played it with a will, the men of the regiment seeming to enjoy it all the more for the evident annoyance it occasioned to a large portion of the bystanders. At a late hour the regiment marched through the city to the Camden Station and took the cars for Washington. A crowd was collected at the depot, and a few faint cheers rose above the noise and confusion of the departure.

The regiment arrived at Washington at half-past one o'clock on Tuesday morning, May 28. Early in the morning the regiment marched up Pennsylvania Avenue, passing the President's house, and on to Kalorama, about two miles out of the city, and went into camp. Immediately a special messenger arrived from the President, complimenting Col. Tappan as having the best appointed regiment that had thus far come into Washington. During the day numerous philanthropic ladies and gentlemen and sanitary committees visited the camp and inquired after the wants of the men, proffering services for their relief, and seemed almost incredulous when told they needed nothing. It was a novelty for a regiment to appear at Washington prepared to take care of themselves, so hastily had the troops left their homes to rush to the defense of the nation capital

When in camp the religious services consisted uniformly of singing by the regiment and reading of the scriptures and prayer by the Chaplain, immediately after the dress parade. On Sunday there was added a short address by the Chaplain. While at Kalorama, very many spectators of all classes, from Washington, congregated to witness these ceremonies, and among them were often seen President Lincoln and family. Just before the religious services on the 1st of June, firing was heard in the direction of Alexandria, and an unofficial messenger communicated the intelligence that an engagement was in progress, and the First New Hampshire Regiment was to be called out, which created no little excitement among the men, not one of whom had ever been under fire, and the worthy Chaplain had caught something of the infection. A disconnected portion of his prayer on that occasion has often been published in such a way as to do that gentleman great injustice. It was to the effect "That if God could make it consistent with his purposes concerning us as a people and a nation, blood-shed and violence might be averted; but if otherwise, his purpose, justice, liberty and peace demanded the sacrifice, that He would give to our soldiers a brave heart, a firm nerve, a steady eye, and send the missile straight to its mark." The alarm proved to be a false one and the excitement soon subsided.

At seven o'clock on Monday morning, the 10th of June, the regiment broke camp and joined a brigade commanded by Col. Charles P. Stone, and marched to Rockville, nineteen miles. The day was very warm, and some of the men, overcome by the heat, fell out by the way, but were helped forward in the wagons and by officers who dismounted and placed them upon their horses, Col. Tappan and the others often giving up their horses to weary and over-heated privates. The regiment went into camp upon the Montgomery County Fair Grounds, a beautiful spot, and named it Camp Lincoln. Here they made the acquaintance of the New York Ninth, in this wise: While on the march from Kalorama the Ninth was behind the New Hampshire First. When they halted at noon for rest and refreshment, the Ninth marched first and passed our regiment, at which our boys were a little piqued, considering it a breach of etiquette. They occupied the north slope of the Fair Ground and our regiment the south. At the dress parade the next day the Ninth came out first and were looked upon in mute curiosity. The First followed and did their best, while the Ninth watched them with astonishment at their proficiency in drill, and expressed approbation by frequent cheers. After the parade was over the First returned to the parade ground and began vociferously to cheer the Ninth, which compliment was enthusiastically returned, and for ten minutes the two were pitted against each other in the exercise of the vocal organs upon the highest possible pitch, when suddenly the Ninth vaulted the fence which separated them and rushed to the area; the First accepted the challenge, and instantly not less than fifteen hundred soldiers were shaking hands, embracing each other, shaking the earth with their cheers and stamping and literally filling the air with their caps. Such a scene of sinking all prejudice in the cordial greetings of kindred spirits it is not the privilege of men often to witness. The most intimate friendship ever after prevailed between them, attracting the notice of the entire brigade.

The people of Rockville were struck with the utmost consternation at the appearance of our troops, supposing that "beauty and booty" was their sole errand. This impression was soon dissipated, however, by the kind and orderly behavior of the men. The men were generally very well behaved and respected the property of the inhabitants, while there were a few who were much inclined to find something good to eat, without so much regard to the superior claims of the owners. A stuttering soldier entered a house and asked the good lady to sell him some pie, who replied, "We don't sell pies to your kind of soldiers." He coolly drew his pistol, laid it on the table, sat down beside it and began, Yankee fashion, to ask many indifferent questions. Finally he inquired, "Ho-ow-ow long do-does it t-t-take to bu-bu-build a-a house d-d-down here?" "Wall 'bout three months, I reckon, if we work right smart." "D-d-does it? (looking around the room), it wo-wo-wont t-take three ho-hours t-t-to p-p-pull it d-d-down." His creature wants were soon supplied, and after offering to pay he bowed himself out with a grateful "t-t-thank you ma-a-am."

But one Union flag was displayed in the place—showing that secession was the prevailing sentiment—and this was in the yard of Rev. L. S. Russell, rector of the Episcopal church, and a son of Major Russell, of Boston, of Revolutionary note. There were a few other Union families there, and many that professed Union for the occasion. Court was in session, and one of the soldiers took a small flag, went into the second story of the court house, and reaching out of a window, stuck the staff into a joint of the bricks, where it remained until the regiment left. It was the occasion of much angry talk and many threats, but no one dared to touch it.

On the 14th of June the regiment started on the march to Poolsville. It was reported from Washington that Harper's Ferry was evacuated by the rebels, and that they were liable to come down upon the small bodies of troops stationed as guards along the river. The march was apparently a perilous one, but the utmost cheerfulness was manifested by the men. The regiment bivouacked for the night at Darnestown, nine miles from Rockville, and arrived at Poolsville, nine miles further, about noon of the 15th. The real object of this movement proved to be to guard the river against the rebels who might contemplate crossing. There being a large force of rebels at Leesburg, Va., five miles inland from Conrad Ferry, fears were entertained that they would attempt to cross at that point. On the morning of the 17th, Companies A, C, E, G and I were sent there under command of Lieut. Col. Whipple. When within about a mile of the Ferry the rebels opened fire upon them with rifles, and soon after with six lb. cannon, while the detachment of the First Regiment had nothing but Springfield muskets. They continued the fire at intervals for an hour. In the afternoon the enemy opened fire again with rifles and cannon, and thus continued from time to time through that day and the day following. On the evening of the 17th Col. Stone ordered Capt. Gardner, of the Pennsylvania Riflemen, with twenty of his company, to the Ferry, who joined in the fight, firing simultaneously with the boys of the First Regiment into the smoke of the enemy, the only indication of their exact position. Here the firing on both sides ceased. The rebels acknowledged the loss of one captain and two privates killed and about twelve wounded. None of our men were hurt, though several very narrowly escaped.

As soon as it was ascertained that the firing was in the direction of the Ferry, Col. Tappan started with the other five companies of the regiment for the scene of action, soon after which he met a messenger who notified him of the engagement. He was soon, however, overtaken by an order from Col. Stone, to return and guard the camp from an anticipated attack from another direction. There was some difference of opinion as to the propriety of sending so many men to the Ferry, which was Col. Stone's plan, Col. Tappan being of opinion that a simple picket would be less likely to invite an attack, which was not the object in view.

An incident occurred here worthy to be recorded to the memory of the actress. Mrs. Dr. Brace was sitting by the Chaplain's tent door when the firing was first heard. She mounted her horse and rode home, and immediately wrote the following note to the Captain of a company of infantry belonging to Poolsville. The Captain was Union, but most of his men were secesh :

“CAPT. FLETCHER :—Do you fight under the Stars and Stripes? If so, up and be doing! Virginia is firing upon Maryland! Shall we stand idly by and let Northern men protect our homes and firesides?”

A Miss Susan Dawson, nineteen years of age, of Dawsonville, Va., whose widowed mother's house was ever a soldier's home, was one day on a visit to her uncle's, at Poolsville. The uncle being absent a secesh came to the door and demanded a stand of arms that the uncle was known to have in his possession. Her aunt being a timid woman, Susan went to the door and refused to give them up. He first attempted to intimidate her by insolence and threats, but finding her proof against this kind of tactics, he asked to see the arms, when she replied :—“The arms belong to the State of Maryland, and in due time will be returned to the State authorities. You can neither have them nor see them, and the sooner you are off the better.” He left without further parley.

These are perhaps fair samples of the spirit of the true Union women met with in Maryland during the first few months of the rebellion. Their boldness and decision might well have been emulated by many professed Union men at the North during those days, when doubt and indecision gave to the rebels courage and hope.

The following correspondence, showing the state of feeling in Maryland at that time, is worth a place here :

“DARNESTOWN, June 19, 1861.

“REV. MR. ABBOTT,—Dear Sir:—I learned through my friend, E. S. Hayes, that you had passed through Darnestown en route for the D. C., and would return to-day, and concluded I would write you concerning some information I received on my return from Poolsville on the same day you arrived at that place. Mr. N. Almutt, who owns the farm located on each side of Seneca Creek, which you crossed en route to Poolsville, and one of our strongest Union men, who has been voting with the democratic party and owning slaves, and is one who I know would not misrepresent the conduct of any one. I stopped at his house on my return, and he was somewhat desponding. I inquired the cause, and his reply was: He had enough to discourage the hope of non-interference on the part of the troops with our slaves.

“As your regiment was passing by his farm, his farm hands were plowing corn in a field bordering on the road, and as the men moved up the road he followed along with the regiment as far as his house, and saw several of your men beckon to his servants in the field and ask them if they did not want to be free, &c. Now, my dear sir, this is all wrong, and ought to be stopped.

“God knows I speak from the best motives and with a view to strengthen the Union feeling. Break down the idea of interference, and ultimately save our country, and render your lives more comfortable and pleasant while absent from your families.

“I hope you will call the Colonel’s attention to this fact, and oblige

“Your respectful friend and well-wisher,

“JOHN L. DUFIEF,

“Darnestown, Md.

“N. B. May God in his mercy avert this horrible war, and all learn to respect the laws and the Constitution, and continue as a nation unto the end of time, a happy, prosperous and united people. Hoping you and your friends may return to your families safely, “Remain yours, &c.,

“J. L. D.

“POOLSVILLE, Md., June 21, 1861.

“JOHN L. DUFIEF, Esq.—My dear sir :—Your favor of the 19th inst., was duly received and read with great interest. I admire the frankness with which you speak, and confide in the spirit and motive by which you are actuated; and I assure you that in my reply, the same frankness, spirit and motive shall be sacredly regarded.

“It seems that your friend’s despondency is predicated solely on the fact that he ‘saw several of our men beckon to his servants in the field and ask them if they did not want to be free,’ &c. ‘This,’ you say, ‘is all wrong and ought to be stopped.’ I fully believe his statement and agree with you in your conclusion; and I assure you that should any of our men be detected in tampering with the slaves for the purpose of aiding them to escape, they would meet with severe and merited punishment. We came here for no such purpose, and no such conduct is, or will be tolerated under any ordinary circumstances. Whether or not, in a seceding state, slaves—as property—would be considered, contraband of war and subject to confiscation, is a question upon which I have consulted no one, and can give no opinion. One thing is certain, whatever may be the sentiment of a part of our regiment, with regard to the moral right of slavery, we have come here with the intention of recognizing the fact of property in slaves and of respecting the rights of citizens who hold such property. Now, my dear sir, with this possible exception you and your friends from the District of Columbia to the Gulf of Mexico may rest in the utmost security. Not a slave will be permitted to go one mile or rod with us, from his master, with our knowledge.

“Now to be a little more definite with regard to the case you mention, let me say, first, that we have nearly a thousand men with us, the first enlistment of volunteers; and can any rational man expect or even demand that there should be no rogues among them who would do such a thing merely for mischief? I do not know of one and yet there may be, and if so, should that discourage Union men here? or should the whole regiment be held responsible for it, and their motive be impugned for it?

“Again. If you and your friend were as well acquainted with Yankee character as I am, you would be more amused than alarmed at such questioning. We are constitutionally and hereditarily addicted to asking questions, and the propensity to gratify curiosity is as irresistible as the current of a mighty river. Hence the same question has always been asked by northerners, both pro-slavery and anti-slavery, in traveling south. It is simply a wish to know for themselves what they learn by testimony. I feel the same curiosity myself, though I have wholly restrained it, on account of the extreme sensitiveness of the people just at this time. I very seriously doubt whether a man in our company had any other motive in the questions they asked.

“I thought when I left home, and every day’s march and every day’s residence here confirm the opinion, that a more intimate social acquaintance of the people North and South will do more than all the bayonets in the country to harmonize feeling and effect a desirable and permanent peace as it respects the masses. When they are right, all is right. God knows that such a peace is the one great desire of the masses of the North, and I doubt not the same is true of the South also.

“Our arms are not taken up for the purpose of ‘invasion,’ or for ‘blotting out the South,’ but simply to stand by and defend the government and the glorious old flag, which have been assailed. Let us now, my dear sir, believe each other, trust each other, be charitable towards each other and stand shoulder to shoulder in the cause upon the success of which depend our security, our prosperity and the value of all our prized institutions. Let us devoutly pray to the God of nations that right and justice may prevail and peace be speedily restored.

“I designed to say in another connection that slaves are daily sent into camp on business whose masters have repeatedly expressed the utmost confidence in our men. And slaves are all the time at work in a field adjoining our camp, and no fears are expressed, because, I firmly believe, no occasion for fear is given.

“Let me say in conclusion, that I cannot hold myself bound to reply to letters upon this subject, because we do not propose any such interference as is suggested; but knowing the kind spirit in which you write I am very happy to respond, and shall be happy to acknowledge any further correspondence with you. I have written this in great haste, that it may go by a messenger about leaving, and you are at liberty to make such honorable use of it as you please.

“Respectfully your friend and brother,

“S. G. ABBOTT,

“Chap. 1st N. H. Vol. M.”

The regiment remained at Poolsville twenty-one days, and guarded about fifteen miles of the river, night and day, besides doing much guard and picket duty in other directions. For days at a time they had not less than twenty miles of sentinels, so near to each other that the discharge of a musket would in a few minutes alarm every man in the regiment.

As has been remarked, the men of this regiment generally respected the rights and property of the inhabitants in the vicinity of their camp, though there were occasional complaints made to the Colonel of their depredations. One morning a citizen entered a complaint, and the Colonel soon after met a squad of the boys who he suspected might have been concerned in the appropriation of certain fowls which were missing, and told them with apparent seriousness that they had got themselves into trouble. “Why,” said one of them, “what is the trouble?” “Mr. A. says he has lost eleven geese.” “Eleven geese! did he say any thing about his pigs?” This was a little too much for the Colonel’s gravity, and he passed on with a snuff and a laugh that any one would appreciate who has seen him, and nobody else can.

One day the Staff found upon the dinner-table a roast pig, of which they all ate freely, asking no questions. Soon after all were sick except the Chaplain, whose escape the others jocosely attributed to the fact that he had become used to such food; whereupon he retorted that it was not so, but because he was not aware that the pig was stolen, while they were.

THREE MONTHS' TROOPS.

The regiment acquired and retained the reputation through its division of the army for great fearlessness and daring, and passed everywhere by the sobriquet of "The New Hampshire Wild Cats." It was no uncommon thing for them to meet rebel pickets midway of the river by swimming or fording, drink each other's health, mutually curse the war, and return to duty. H. M. Prescott, of Bristol, swam across the river, unmoored a boat, and pushed it before him till he thought it safe to get in. He was hardly seated before a rebel ball passed between his arm and side, glanced upon the side of the boat, spent itself in the stern, and rolled back to his feet, whereupon he jumped into the water and pushed the boat across. Such incidents were not infrequent during this encampment.

On the 3d of July that portion of the regiment which was stationed at Conrad Ferry, broke camp and marched eight miles to the mouth of the Monocacy, a branch of the Potomac, where they spent the Fourth. That part of the regiment which was stationed at Edward's Ferry, five miles below Conrad, arrived at Monocacy on the morning of the 5th, just in season to join the advance before marching to Point of Rocks, a dirty little secesh village, six miles from Monocacy. The day before their arrival the proprietor of the St. Charles Hotel had refused Col. Stone entertainment, whereupon he marched up a company of men, took military possession and run the hotel on his own account. Here the men saw the cars for the first time since leaving Washington.

On the 6th of July a detachment, under command of Col. Tappan, moved by cars to Sandy Hook, twelve miles, opposite Harper's Ferry, and in the night orders were received to send all the baggage that could be spared to Frederick, leave the tents behind in charge of a guard, and prepare for rapid movements. At noon on the 7th the reserve was sent up by cars to Sandy Hook. It was Col. Stone's design to cross the river and take possession of Harper's Ferry, believing that the best base of operations for that department. Before the movement was made, however, a messenger was sent down the river from Gen. Patterson with orders to advance to Williamsport and join him in the pursuit of Johnston.

At 7 o'clock, P. M., they marched again, keeping the Maryland side of the river, and arrived at Sharpsburg, twelve miles, at two o'clock on the morning of the 7th, and at Williamsport, twelve miles further, in the afternoon, immediately forded the river, and trod for the first time the sacred soil of Virginia. Here they again joined the New York Ninth and other regiments of the brigade.

At four o'clock on the morning of the 8th of July the entire command of Col. Stone marched for Martinsburg, twelve miles, arriving there at noon, and joined the command of Gen. Patterson, between Williamsport and Martinsburg. Patterson had his running fight with Johnston, called the battle of Falling Waters, from a small but very rapid brook of pure cold water. The prostrate fences, torn and prostrate trees, riddled and demolished houses and fresh graves by the road side, indicated the field of action. A rebel ball crashed into the corner of the roof of a house, and through the aperture was run up the Union flag.

About sixteen thousand troops were concentrated here, and it was the design to march the following day in pursuit of Johnston, but it was subsequently determined to postpone the march until further orders, though it was then regarded of great importance to prevent him from marching from Winchester to re-enforce the army at Manassas. Gen. Patterson's action in this matter was a mystery, and after a thorough investigation of the circumstances he was superseded by Gen. N. P. Banks, of Massachusetts.

The clothes of the men had become very much worn and they were almost shoeless. What new pants they had were distributed, but not a pair of shoes could be obtained. Necessity is the mother of invention. Lieut. George W. Colbath, of Dover, was detailed to head the force; leather, thread, awls and hammers were obtained; pegs were made with knives, and soon several shoemaker's shops were extemporized and in full operation in the grove where the regiment was encamped; the old shoes were mended, and the men's feet thus made comfortable for the time.

The boys were obliged to make all sorts of shifts to cover their nakedness. Three of them got a sutler's sign, painted upon cotton cloth—"Pies and Cakes," divided it into three parts, and patched the seats of their pantaloons with it. Their positions were together in the line, and when on parade it read from right to left of the company, "PIES AND CAKES," to the no small amusement of the regiment.

Another man patched the seat of his pantaloons with the discarded covering of a ham, plainly marked in circular form, "SUGAR-CURED HAMS, FOR FAMILY USE."

An institution of the regiment, and indeed of the army, was the fife-major, Francis H. Pike, of Manchester. Any attempt to describe his personal appearance would be futile. He could only be appreciated after having been seen, in full uniform, baton in hand, at the head of the regiment. Those who never saw him thus have yet to see a fife-major. He had left his gaudy uniform at Point of Rocks and had on only a fatigue cap and blouse. Walking up to the hotel door, where a guard was stationed with strict orders to let none pass in but commissioned officers, he was suddenly brought to a halt. Drawing himself up to his full height and looking down upon the sentinel with the utmost indignation, he calmly, but with great authority asked—"Do you know who I am, sir?" The sentinel felt the majesty of his speech and meekly inquired, "Are you an officer?" "What do I look like, sir?" replied the indignant fife-major. "Pass," was the laconic answer.

On Monday, July 15, at five o'clock in the morning, the regiment with the rest of the division under Gen. Patterson—consisting of twenty-seven regiments and six hundred wagons—were on the march, and all hearts were fired with enthusiasm when they found themselves on the road to Winchester. The rebels were scattered along the road in small companies, but fled on the approach of the Union army. A few cannon shots were occasionally exchanged, but no one was injured. They arrived at Bunker Hill, ten miles from Martinsburg, about two o'clock, P. M., and encamped on ground just vacated by the rebels, a small force of whom retreated from Bunker Hill with the utmost haste. They were now within fifteen miles of Winchester, and were elated with the expectation of being led next morning to that place, either to engage the enemy or to intercept and prevent him from re-enforcing the army at Manassas.

The day was passed in a feeble reconnoissance in the direction of Winchester, with no results. The next morning, the 17th, at day light, instead of advancing on Winchester, a retreat to Charlestown, twelve miles, was commenced. It now became quite evident that there was no design on the part of Gen. Patterson to meet the enemy. The army marched into the village of Charlestown about noon, taking the people by surprise. The men were discouraged and demoralized.

They had several times expected to meet the rebels, and had as often been disappointed, which they charged upon Gen. Patterson.

Charlestown was a place of more than ordinary interest to the troops as the scene of John Brown's imprisonment, trial and execution. The court house, jail and the site of the gallows, were visited by thousands, and anything that could be gathered in the form of relics, was carried away.

On the night of the 18th, Capt. Kelley's company, while on picket, captured a horse and carriage with two men. They also arrested two negroes at different times, who proved to belong to the same master, and both told the same story, as follows: Their master was in the rebel army; their overseer, who lived two miles out of the village, was captain of a company of local militia. On the approach of our army he disbanded the company; secreted their arms under the eaves of the Court House; hid his uniform, and went home. A report was made in the morning at head-quarters and a search was ordered. Lieut. Nettleton, of Co. D, being that day Lieutenant of the guard, commenced the search in the attic, but found nothing, when he was informed by a citizen that he helped bury the arms in the cellar of the Court House, whereupon Lieut. Nettleton set a squad of the Massachusetts Twelfth to digging, Capt. Barton being present and assisting. Forty-three stand of arms were found, which were carried away by the Massachusetts Twelfth, who claimed the credit of the discovery. All the County records, stationery, &c., were found here, evidently buried in great haste. Lieut. Nettleton, with a squad of men, surrounded a house and arrested a rebel Lieutenant and his accomplices, securing their arms.

On the night of the 20th the regiment received the first information of fighting at Manassas, and in the night received orders to cook one day's rations. On the morning of the 21st, the day of the battle of Bull Run, the division marched to Harper's Ferry, six miles, and encamped on Bolivar Heights. Before marching from Charlestown, Col. Stone gave orders to his command that any man stealing from the citizens should have his head shaved and be drummed out of the camp, as the least punishment. Said he, "I never was in or saw an army that conducted as this did at Bunker Hill, the New Hampshire First excepted."

Gen. N. P. Banks was appointed to supersede Gen. Patterson, and arrived on the night of the 24th and assumed the command, much to the gratification of officers and men, all of whom had looked upon the latter with distrust for some weeks. The change of commanders inspired the men with new spirit and confidence in the ultimate success of the cause for which they had been called from the peaceful walks of life.

On the 28th the First Regiment moved three miles to Sandy Hook, where they went into camp and remained until the 2d of August, when, their term of enlistment having expired, they embarked on board the cars for New Hampshire. They were paid, mustered out of service and discharged at Concord on the 12th of August, 1861.

The casualties in the regiment were as follows:

Discharged before leaving the State,	3
Discharged by reason of disability,	13
Discharged by court-marshal,	2
Deaths from different causes,	4
Captured by the enemy,	5
Transferred to 2d N. H. Regiment,	1

THREE MONTHS' TROOPS.

Although the First New Hampshire Regiment did not have the privilege of inscribing any pitched battles upon their banner—which was no fault of their's—they yet rendered very arduous and important service to the country, at a time when to hesitate was to be lost, and never shirked any duty which they were called to perform, or which the imperiled country required at their hands. Many, if not most, of the men of this subsequently re-enlisted and served in other New Hampshire regiments with honor and distinction. Lieut. Col. Whipple was made Colonel of the Fourth; Major Stevens was Colonel of the Thirteenth; Adjutant Fellows was Colonel of the Third, and also of the Ninth; Capt. Bell was Colonel of the Fourth on the resignation of Col. Whipple; Capt. Barton was Lieut. Colonel of the Heavy Artillery; Quartermaster Batchelder served in the Army of the Potomac as Brigade and Division Quartermaster, with honor to the State; Surgeon Crosby—who unlike many surgeons in the army then and subsequently, knew and kindly, carefully and faithfully administered to the needs of the men, and will ever be remembered with great respect—rendered most valuable service in the Army of the Potomac. Chaplain Abbott, than whom no regiment ever had a more patriotic, faithful and industrious one, returned to his high calling and has labored consistently for the salvation of the souls of men. He compiled a small book, containing thirty or forty hymns, for the use of his regiment, which was the first one of its kind in the army. Capt. Sturtevant was Major of the Fifth Regiment and was killed at the battle of Fredericksburg; Capt. Drew was Lieut. Colonel of the Fourth; Lieut. Sawyer was Major of the Fourth; Lieut. Fuller was Adjutant of the Fourth; Capt. Kelley was afterwards Brigade Quartermaster; Captains Greenleaf and Sleeper, and Lieuts. Clough and Wallace were Captains in the Fourth;

Lieut. Israel L. Drew was First Lieut. in the Fourth, and died at Annapolis; Fife-Major Pike was Principal Musician in the Fourth. Other commissioned and non-commissioned officers and privates served in different organizations, with the ever varying fortunes of war.

New Hampshire has many reasons for pride in its First Regiment and the officers and men who composed it.

ACTION OF THE STATE.

THE annual session of the Legislature commenced at Concord on the 5th of June, 1861. On the 6th Governor Goodwin delivered a valedictory address, which contained the following paragraphs :

“ Since the last session of the General Court a revolution against the progress of civilization and the liberties of the people has been attempted in our country. This revolution has been for years in preparation, and derives its principal strength from the efforts and influence of men holding place under the General Government, who have conspired to overthrow that Constitution which it was their solemn and imperative duty to uphold. This gigantic conspiracy against liberty and law developed during the past winter a formidable organization for the destruction of the best government which good men ever formed; against which bad men ever conspired; and that our government, controlled as it has been to a great extent by its enemies, has not been entirely overthrown, is to be attributed to the self-adjusting power of free institutions, and the virtues and energies of a free people.

“ While it was yet uncertain how far this rebellion would extend, and with an earnest desire that nothing which honorable men could either ask or grant should be left untried, to preserve a Union consecrated by so many hallowed memories, and hitherto attended by such unexampled prosperity, I, in compliance with the unanimous recommendation of our delegation in Congress, and in accordance with my own views of duty, requested the Hon. Amos Tuck, the Hon. Levi Chamberlain, and the Hon. Asa Fowler to attend as Commissioners for this State, the Convention which assembled at Washington on the 4th of February last, upon the recommendation of the State of Virginia.

“ On the 15th of April last I received by telegraph, through the War Department, a requisition from the President of the United States, calling for one regiment from this State for three months’ service, to be employed in suppressing the rebellion against the laws of the General Government.

“ This requisition was followed by an intimation that another regiment might soon be required. The state of our militia organization was such that I could not, by a military order, fulfill the constitutional obligations of the State. Upon reflection, I came to the conclusion that I could meet this call with less delay and less expense by a voluntary enlistment, than by any other method, and this course was adopted. The prompt and liberal manner in which our banks and citizens placed a large amount of money at my disposal, removed the necessity of convening a special session of the Legislature.

“ So unanimous was our whole population in resisting this attempt to overthrow the Constitution and liberties of the people, that the second regiment was filled as readily as the first. While the second regiment was organizing, and after the appointment of Col. T. P. Pierce, of Manchester, to its command, I received information from the War Department that it was the desire of the government that all future enlistments should be made for ‘three years, or during the war,’ and that men enlisted for three months, refusing to enlist for the war, be discharged. In accordance with this suggestion I changed the term of enlistment, and over five hundred of those who had enlisted for three months re-enlisted for three years, and the entire regiment of one thousand and forty-six men was promptly made up.

“Col. Pierce, whom I esteem a valuable officer, in consequence of the change in the term of service, having resigned his command, the Hon. Gilman Marston has been appointed to his place. This regiment has also been mustered into the service of the United States by Major Eastman, of the United States army, and is under drill at Portsmouth. It will leave in a few days for Washington. So generously have our patriotic citizens responded to the call of the country, that many of the three months men, left at Fort Constitution, and others who have enlisted for three years but are not required to complete the second regiment, will form a nucleus for a third regiment, the enrollment of which can be readily accomplished if required; otherwise they will serve to give efficiency to the re-organization of the State militia. A portion of the three months recruits has been placed by Maj. Gen. Wool, at my suggestion, in Fort Constitution, for the defense of the harbor of Portsmouth, and by authority of Gen. Wool and the Secretary of the Navy, I have put that fort in a condition of defense.

“A rifle company, composed principally of Concord young men, of high character and sobriety, under command of Capt. Griffin, of Concord, were desirous of being armed with Sharp’s rifles, to fit them as skirmishers to the Second Regiment. The citizens of Concord, together with many members of the company, subscribed an amount sufficient to pay for these rifles, provided the State would not assume the expense, and the arms have been furnished with the above understanding. I am assured that the United States will ultimately pay for them. It is for you to decide whether the State will accept the responsibility for the present, or whether it will rest with the patriotic subscribers.

“I communicate herewith a circular from the Hon. Simon Cameron, Secretary of War, requesting that the several States will keep regiments enlisted and under drill, in their respective States, and prepared for service, upon call, and that when called into service of the United States, their places may be supplied by new enlistments.”

The Peace Conference, referred to in Gov. Goodwin's address, assembled at Washington on the 4th of February, 1861—one month before the inauguration of President Lincoln. Twenty states were represented, thirteen of which were free, and seven were slave states. The extreme South was resolved upon breaking up the Government, and establishing in its stead a slaveholding oligarchy, and they refused to take any part in the Peace Conference, notwithstanding the proposition for it came from the slaveholding State of Virginia. Ex-President John Tyler, of Virginia was made chairman.

On motion of James Gurthrie, of Kentucky, a committee of one from each State was appointed by the chair, on the nomination of the Commissioners thereof, to whom was referred the resolution of the State of Virginia. Hon. Asa Fowler was appointed on the part of New Hampshire. The Conference was in session twenty-one days, and came to the following result, which was published to the world as the basis for the settlement of all national differences :

1. That Congress shall never interfere with slavery in the District of Columbia, over which, by the Constitution, Congress held exclusive jurisdiction, without the consent of the slaveholding State of Maryland, and the consent of the slaveholders of the District.

2. That Congress shall not forbid slaveholders from bringing their slaves to Washington, nor abolish slavery in any of the dockyards, fortresses, or territories under the jurisdiction of the United States, where slavery then existed.

3. That Congress should not prohibit, and should so amend the Constitution, that the States should not prohibit, the transportation of slaves from and through any of the States and Territories, where slavery then existed either by law or usage.

The only concession exacted from the South was, that they should agree to the suppression of the slave trade, which was prohibited by Congress years before as piracy; that the District of Columbia should not be used as a slave market, which also had been forbidden by a previous compromise; and that slavery should be prohibited in all the territory north of the parallel of 36° 30' north latitude.

Eleven states voted in favor and seven against these peace propositions, while two were divided in their vote. They were reported to Congress, and adopted in the House by 133 yeas to 65 nays, to be recommended to the people, but have never been heard of since. The South meant separation, and nothing else, and acted consistently with that idea.

At the close of Gov. Goodwin's address, Nathaniel S. Berry, of Hebron, having been elected Governor in March, appeared, accepted the office, took the oaths prescribed by the Constitution, and was declared by Herman Foster, of Manchester, President of the Senate, Governor for the ensuing political year. He delivered his annual address, from which the following, relating to the rebellion, is extracted :

“The seizure of forts, arsenals, mints and public property of the Union, and attacks on its flag, and the usurpation of powers of the General Government which we have recently witnessed, are high-handed acts of treason, without any justification, and based on the most groundless and frivolous pretenses. No allegation or excuse has been given, or can be given, to justify the enormity of the offenses committed. On this ground our people stand as one man.

“The masses of the citizens of the different States may not be holden responsible for these acts of treason and rebellion, but their leaders must and will be so holden by the true men of this country and the indignant sentiment of the civilized world. The crimes committed against us, against the memory and labors of our fathers, and the common and best interests of humanity, we cannot excuse or tolerate.

“We unite in the sentiments of Washington, of Webster, and of Jackson, as to the infinite moment of our National Union to the collective and universal happiness of the American people; that we can have but ‘one country, one Constitution and one destiny;’ and that by every hazard and by every sacrifice, the ‘Union must be preserved.’

“With the country divided into separate governments, having long lines of border communications, we should be subject to continued strife; we could not live in peace as independent adjoining communities. The way of our fathers under the Constitution, rigidly adhered to by all sections, in its true force and spirit, is the only sure way of national prosperity.

“The position taken by our government in the recent correspondence with the French Minister, is the only ground upon which we can stand: ‘That there is not now, nor has there been, nor will there be, any, the least idea existing in this government of suffering a dissolution of this Union to take place in any way whatever.’

“Under this enunciation of principles, the open, deadly, flagrant war which is now waged against the government of the United States, to compel acquiescence in the dismemberment of the Union, will cease and come to an end, when the Constitution is maintained and enforced, as under the better days of the Republic, under Washington and Adams, Jefferson and Jackson, and not till then. But in this view of our condition we have a high and important duty to discharge.

“Most of the loyal States of this Union have already holden special sessions of their Legislatures, to act on the immediate necessities of the crisis. The regular session of our Legislature was so near at hand, that a special session was not deemed essential with us; especially considering the prompt and efficient measures taken by my predecessor. The Legislature being now assembled, there is a pressing necessity for immediate attention to those measures that shall aid the General Government in resisting the rebellion now waged against our institutions.

“No northern State has placed less than a million of dollars at the command of the General Government, in view of the present emergency of the country, and I trust New Hampshire will not be behind her sister States in this respect, and that whatever we may do may be done with perfect unanimity.

“In conclusion, permit me to recur to the great struggle with treason and rebellion, in which our country is now engaged. It is a rebellion against the most beneficent government ever established upon earth. It threatens with extinguishment our Republic, which has been, and under God will continue to be, the light of nations. In open defiance of the great principle that the final supremacy of the will of the majority, constitutionally expressed, upon which the stability of republican governments depend, this flagrant rebellion has been commenced. It is evidently the purpose of the rebel leaders to substitute, for the rule of the majority, the rule of the minority, with the natural result of anarchy or despotism.

“The deep and holy enthusiasm with which the people of the loyal States have responded to the call of the government for military aid to put down the rebellion and crush out treason, can leave no doubt of the final result of the struggle. Never in the history of the world was there witnessed a prouder spectacle than the loyal patriotism which was aroused in the land by the guns of Sumter. Party spirit was hushed, and twenty millions of freemen, with one accord, joined hands in solemn pledge that the Union, Constitution and Government shall be maintained.

“The result of the conflict will be the convincing of the world that a republican government can and will be sustained. It may be that our country must be shaken from center to circumference by the mighty struggle; that liberty must be again baptized in blood; but the principles upon which the republic was founded will be vindicated and made permanent; the Constitution will be sustained; the constitutional rights of all American citizens, in all the States, will receive new guarantees; the freedom of speech and of the press every where in our land will be effectually secured, and the government will come forth purified and strengthened.

“We acknowledge the dependence of all rulers and states on Him by whom all government is ordained. We cannot believe that He who was the God of our fathers, and under whose protecting care our country has risen from feebleness to strength, will permit the great experiment of free government to fail, or come short of the ultimate complete security of our greatness and happiness as a united people.”

At an early stage of the session a bill was introduced in the Legislature entitled “An Act to aid in the defense of the country," which, after much discussion and strenuous opposition from a portion of the members, was passed, as follows :

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives, in General Court convened :

SECTION 1. All payments and expenditures made by the Governor and Council, or by their authority and direction, in order to furnish troops from this State for the defense of the United States, or for enlisting, arming, equipping, disciplining, maintaining or transporting said troops, or in any way connected therewith, are hereby approved, ratified and confirmed.

SEC. 2. In order to answer any call for troops from this State that has been or may be made by the President of the United States, or by his sanction and authority, the Governor, with the advice and consent of the Council, is hereby vested with full power and authority to take such measures as may be deemed best, for the enlisting, arming, equipping, disciplining, maintaining and transporting such military force of this State as in his judgment may be needed for defending and maintaining, in its full integrity, the authority of the government of the United States, and the constitution and the laws thereof; and to this end he may, with the advice and consent of the Council, appoint all needful officers and agents, and may fix their rank and pay; provided that at no one time more than two regiments shall be enlisted in addition to those that shall have been already mustered into the service of the United States.

SEC. 3. The Governor, with the advice and consent of the Council, is hereby authorized to pay from the money appropriated by this act, any of the troops of this State which have been or may be mustered into the service of the United States, during the whole or any part of the time of such service; and the Governor, with the advice and consent of the Council, is hereby authorized and empowered to negotiate, adjust and settle all questions, accounts, matters and things, between this State and the United States, in any way arising from or growing out of the contracts and expenditures mentioned in this act, or out of any contracts or expenditures which may be made for the public defense or the payment of troops.

SEC. 4. For the purpose of meeting the expenses already incurred, or any that may be incurred under this act, or any other act to provide for the defense of the country, or for maintaining the military force of this State, while engaged therein, the Treasurer of this State is hereby authorized, under the sanction of the Governor, with the advice and consent of the Council, to issue bonds or certificates of debt, in the name and on behalf of this State, to an amount not exceeding one million dollars. Said bonds shall bear interest not exceeding six per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, on the first days of January and July, in each year, and may be issued at such times and in sums of such amount as shall be fixed by the Governor and Council. All such bonds shall have interest warrants or coupons attached thereto, signed by the Treasurer; and said bonds and coupons shall be made payable at the Suffolk Bank, Boston. Said bonds or certificates of debt shall be redeemable in not less than five or more than twenty years from the first day of July, A. D. 1861, and not more than one hundred thousand dollars shall be redeemable in any one year. Said bonds shall be countersigned by the Governor, and shall be deemed a pledge of the faith and credit of the State. The Secretary of State shall keep a record of all the bonds countersigned by the Governor, in which shall be set down the number and amount of each bond so countersigned; the time of such countersigning; the time when such bond shall be payable; the name of the person to whom said bond may be delivered, and the date of such delivery. The Treasurer may, from time to time, under the direction of the Governor and Council, dispose of so much of the same as shall be required, and for that purpose shall advertise, at any time, for proposals for so much as may be needed. And said Treasurer shall keep a record of each bond disposed of by him, which shall contain the name of the person to whom each bond may be sold, and the number thereof, the amount received by him therefor, the date of such sale, and the time of the payment therefor.

SEC. 5. This act shall be in force from and after its passage.

Approved July 3, 1861.

This act passed the House by yeas 169, nays 94; and the Senate by yeas 10, nays 2.

Harry Bingham, of Littleton, presented in the House, a protest to the passage of this act, signed by himself and ninety other members, with the following reasons therefor:

1. Because, the bill compels us to approve, ratify and confirm "All payments made by the Governor and Council, or by their authority and direction, in order to furnish troops from the State for the defense of the United States, or for enlisting, arming, equipping, disciplining, maintaining or transporting said troops, or in any way connected therewith;" of the nature, extent, validity and equity of which we know so little as to be entirely unable to form any definite judgment relative thereto, and because, from any information communicated to this House, we can not assure ourselves or our constituents that it would be safe and proper for us thus to approve, ratify and confirm.

2. Because, by the provisions of this bill, the power to consider and determine what appropriations are necessary, and what disposition has been and shall be made of the money of the people, how and by what agents disbursed, and in what manner accounted for, is taken from the representatives of the people, to whom such power constitutionally belongs, and surrendered to the executive branch of the government.

3. Because we can not permit transactions of any branch of the government to be sealed up from the eyes of the people, or to be placed beyond their power to examine, inspect, and judge.

4. Because we can not regard the action of this House, in the rejection of the amendments proposed to the bill, as other than the assurance that the present war may be waged by unlawful means, for conquest, subjugation, national consolidation, and the extinguishment of State sovereignties, and we are unalterably opposed to the attainment, by any means, of such objects.

The protestants in their document disavowed all considerations and motives of a partisan character, and claimed to act only for the rights and interests of the people, as guaranteed by the Constitution.

Another act was passed authorizing cities and towns to aid the families of volunteers, and for other purposes, as follows :

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives, in General Court convened, as follows :

SECTION 1. That any city or town may raise money by taxation, or otherwise, and, if necessary, apply the same under the direction of the mayor and aldermen of such city, or a committee by them appointed for that purpose, or of the selectmen of such town, or a committee chosen at any meeting duly held for that purpose, for the aid of the wife, and of the children under sixteen years of age, of any inhabitant of such city or town who, as a member of the volunteer or enrolled militia of this State, may have been mustered into, or enlisted in the service of the United States, and for each parent or child of such inhabitant, who, at the time of his enlistment, was dependent on him for support: Provided, such persons are indigent, and stand in need of such relief; and no disabilities of any kind whatever shall be created by reason of aid so furnished and received.

SEC. 2. Any city or town may raise money, by vote, to defray any expense already incurred, or to carry out and fulfill any contract heretofore made with or in behalf of any of its inhabitants, or their families or dependents, which inhabitants may have been called or enlisted into the service of the United States; but all existing contracts between any town or city, and any of its inhabitants, or their families or dependents, shall terminate in ninety days from the date of such contract, or the date of such inhabitants' enlistment, if subsequent to such contract and before the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. Of the sums paid or applied by any city or town for the support of the family or dependents of any inhabitant who may be actually engaged in the service of the United States, as provided in the first section of this act, there shall be annually reimbursed from the treasury of the State, to such city or town, a sum not exceeding one dollar per week for the wife, and one dollar per week for each child or parent of such inhabitant, who, at the time of his being called or enlisting into the service of the United States, was dependent upon him for support: Provided, that the whole sum so reimbursed shall not exceed twelve dollars per month for all the persons named in this section so dependent upon any such inhabitant.

SEC. 4. No reimbursement shall be allowed from the State treasury to any city or town, as provided in the preceding section, until a full report, certified and sworn to by a majority of the selectmen or committee of such town, and by the mayor and a majority of the aldermen of such city, containing a statement of the names and service of the inhabitants of such city or town, whose families or dependents have been assisted, as provided in the first section of this act; and the names of the persons assisted, and the relations which such persons severally bear to such inhabitants respectively, and the sums paid to or for the support of each person, shall have been made to the Treasurer of the State, and carefully examined and approved by him.

SEC. 5. A statement, certified and sworn to by a majority of the board of selectmen of any town, or by the mayor and a majority of the aldermen of any city, shall be made to the State Treasurer on or before the first Wednesday of June annually, of the full amount due such town or city for aid furnished in accordance with the provisions of this act.

SEC. 6. This act shall take effect upon its passage.

Approved July 4, 1861.

The following resolutions passed, both branches of the Legislature, unanimously:

Resolved by the Senate and House Representatives of the State of New Hampshire in General Court convened: That the contest now existing between the Government and the disloyal people that have commenced an unjustifiable and treasonable war upon its constitutional authority, should be regarded by all loyal men not as a sectional war, not an anti-slavery war, nor a war of conquest and subjugation, but simply and solely a war for the maintenance of the Government, the suppression of rebellion, and the preservation of the magna charta of our liberty and national unity.

Resolved, That the State of New Hampshire pledges her resources for the integrity of the Union, for the support of the Constitution, and for the enforcement of the laws of the General Government.

Resolved, That the Constitution is the supreme law of the land, and that no State has the right to secede therefrom and dissolve the Union which that Constitution was made to secure.

Resolved, That the duty of the General Government to suppress all attempts to dissolve the Union is imperative, and can not be evaded.

Resolved, That neither the President nor Congress can constitutionally entertain any proposition which has for its object the dismemberment of the Government or the dissolution of the Union.

Resolved, That in the language of Andrew Jackson, "The Federal Union must be preserved."

Resolved, That the Secretary of the State be directed to send copies of these resolutions to the President of the United States, the presiding officer of each House of Congress, the Governors of the several States, and each Senator and Representative of this State in Congress.

Approved July 4, 1861.

Resolutions were unanimously passed by the Legislature thanking the Sons of New Hampshire in New York and Boston, and the citizens of Worcester, Mass., for their attentions to the First and Second New Hampshire Regiments.

The Executive Council, on whom, with the Governor, was imposed the duty of enlisting, arming, equipping and holding subject to orders from the War Department troops from the State, were R. P. J. Tenney, of Pittsfield; Daniel Sawyer, of Alton; Moody Currier, of Manchester; Charles F. Brooks, of Westmoreland, and Denison R. Burnham, of Plymouth. Allen Tenney, of Concord, was Secretary of State, and Peter Sanborn, of Concord, State Treasurer,—chosen by the Legislature. Joseph C. Abbott, of Manchester, having resigned, Ex-Governor Anthony Colby, of New London, was appointed by the Governor and Council, Adjutant and Inspector-General, in June, 1861.

Ladies organized sanitary aid societies in almost every considerable town in the State, and furnished the men who enlisted with flannel underclothing and many other articles for their health and comfort, not supplied by the government; and sent to the army hospitals beds, bedding, clothing, bandages, wines, jellies, dried fruits, and indeed every thing needed for the sick and wounded soldiers. They continued their labors and good offices, with efficiency and system, without intermission, throughout the war, and did much to add to the comfort of soldiers' families during the absence of their protectors and supporters.

SECOND REGIMENT.

AFTER the organization of the First Regiment, the surplus of men at Camp Union were sent to Camp Constitution, Portsmouth, for the purpose of forming the Second Regiment. They were quartered in rope-walks and adjacent buildings, which had been converted into comfortable barracks, in the southern part of the city. On the 10th of May nine hundred and seventy-nine men—all enlisted for three months—had arrived at camp and were being drilled, disciplined and made acquainted with the duties pertaining to a soldier's life, by Col. Thomas P. Pierce, of Manchester, who had been commissioned Colonel of the regiment, when an order came to the Governor from the War Department to send no more three months troops. In consequence of this change in the term of service, Col. Pierce resigned on the 4th of June, and Hon. Gilman Marston, of Exeter, then a member of Congress from the First District, was commissioned Colonel of the three years regiment, and immediately assumed command.

The following were the commissioned officers of the regiment during its whole term of service, and their record as appears upon the books in the Adjutant General's office, with such corrections as could be obtained :

GENERAL GILMAN MARSTON.

Gen. Gilman Marston is a native of Orford, and the son of a farmer. He comes of fighting stock; of his ancestors more than one took the field, during the early hostilities of the province, and his grand-father, one of the first settlers of Orford, served with much credit as a captain, in the old French war.

His boyhood was passed upon his father's farm, where he formed a practical acquaintance with all the operations of husbandry, and a taste for agricultural pursuits, which has never left him. But he had a strong desire for a collegiate education, and with true New England independence, determined that he would acquire it, without imposing any burden upon his father. By employing his winters in school-teaching, he succeeded in his purpose, and graduated at Dartmouth College in 1837. The next year and a half he was in charge of an academy in Indianapolis, Ind., and then pursued the study of the law in the office of Judge Wilcox, in Orford, at the Dane Law School, at Cambridge, and finally in the office of Messrs. Hubbard and Watts, in Boston.

In 1841 Mr. Marston was admitted to the bar, and at once opened an office in Exeter, where he has since resided. Going there without acquaintance or capital, it required no small degree of courage and resolution to strive for a position in a bar which numbered among its members such men as Levi Woodbury, Ichabod Bartlett, James Bell and Daniel M. Christie. To add to the difficulties which Mr. Marston had to encounter, he was soon attacked by a serious illness, which endangered his life, and disabled him for business, for a considerable time. But his resolution never failed him, and in spite of all discouragements, he steadily made his way in the confidence of the community.

Untiring in his attention to his professional duties, and entering with his whole heart into the cause of his clients, in very little time he made himself known throughout his county as a lawyer of energy and ability, and business flowed in upon him in abundance.

It was not long before he was called upon to make his appearance in political life. In 1845 he was elected a Representative to the State Legislature, and acquitted himself so much to the satisfaction of his constituents that he was re-elected in each of the two succeeding years, and in 1850 was chosen a member of the Constitutional Convention.

In 1859 he was elected a Representative in the Congress of the United States. In accepting the office he relinquished a professional practice among the largest and most lucrative in the State, and devoted his whole time and energies to the duties of his position. He made himself familiar with every subject on which he was called upon to act, and did what he thought to be right, without regard to the consequences to himself. Among those who knew him best he sustained the character of an able, fearless and upright legislator.

He was re-elected to Congress in 1861; but he had long foreseen the crisis which was approaching, and had resolved upon the course which his patriotic feelings dictated. During the trying period which occurred between the inauguration of President Lincoln and the arrival of troops, Mr. Marston was in Washington, and with other loyal and gallant men, enrolled himself in the battalion commanded by Cassius M. Clay, for the protection of the President and the defense of the capital. As soon as Washington was rendered secure, he returned to New Hampshire and tendered his services to the Executive of the State.

The First New Hampshire Regiment had been recruited for three months only; and it was determined to enlist the Second for three years; and to the command of this choice, and soon to be distinguished, body of men, Mr. Marston was at once appointed. He immediately entered upon the duty of organizing it for the field, and on the 20th of June, 1861, he had the satisfaction of conducting it, with full ranks, to Washington.

One month later Col. Marston led his gallant command into the battle of Bull Run. In the hottest of the fight he was wounded by a musket ball, which shattered the bone of the right arm, near the shoulder. Retiring to the rear just long enough to have the fractured limb hastily bound up, he remounted his horse, which being led by an orderly, he returned at once to his regiment. When the retreat took place, he was conveyed to Washington, in a state of great exhaustion and suffering, in an army wagon. Here the surgeons, after consultation, informed the Colonel, that to save his life, his arm must be amputated at the shoulder. He replied that he would never permit it; he believed the arm could be saved, and he would live or die, unamputated. His firmness was most fortunate, for though the climate of Washington was prostrating, yet when he returned to breathe his native air, his improvement was rapid, and in little more than two months he was able to rejoin his regiment, with the wounded arm promising to be nearly as serviceable as ever. The time of his convalescence he improved with characteristic diligence, by making himself familiar with military tactics, and the duties of his position.

From this time till the Spring of 1863, the history of Col. Marston is identified with that of his regiment. During the whole period he was with his men, leading them in every engagement, and sharing their toils and hardships. In the trenches, at Yorktown; at the extreme front, under Hooker, at Williamsburg; amid the miseries of Fair Oaks; during the terrific battles before Richmond; at the overwhelming repulse of the enemy at Malvern Hill; in the second Bull Run campaign, where the regiment met and routed successive lines of the enemy with the bayonet; and at the attack on Fredericksburg under Burnside, Col. Marston, with his brave command, won unfading laurels.

Within this period, he was again seriously wounded, by the accidental discharge of a pistol, in the hands of a lad in an adjoining tent. In the various events of these campaigns, Col. Marston endeared himself to his men by his care for their welfare and comfort, by his exact justice, and above all by requiring from them no service that he was not ready to bear his part in performing.

During the Winter of 1862-63, while the active operations of the Army of the Potomac were suspended, he resumed his seat in Congress, where his presence was deemed of importance, and remained there during the residue of his term.

In the Autumn of 1862 he had received the appointment of Brigadiër General, but had preferred to retain simply the command of his regiment, with which he desired to remain so long as its organization continued; but in April, 1863, he was induced to accept the higher commission, on being placed in charge of the district of St. Mary's, a post of importance, embracing an extensive camp of confederate prisoners, and being directly under the command of the Secretary of War. His force consisted of the Second, Fifth and Twelfth New Hampshire regiments, a regiment of colored troops, one full battery of artillery, and two companies of United States cavalry, to which were added two or more gunboats. The prisoners confined at Point Lookout, at which Gen. Marston's head-quarters were established, numbered at times as many as ten thousand.

The duty of guarding a post so near the enemy's lines, and holding out so strong inducements for an attack, was an arduous and responsible one, and after an experience of nearly a year, Gen. Marston was not reluctant to exchange it for a command in the field.

In April, 1864, he was assigned to the Eighteenth Corps, then in the Army of the James; his brigade consisting of the 81st, 92d, 96th and 139th New York regiments. Early in May they were placed by an unexpected movement up the James, at Bermuda Hundred. In the affair at Kingsland Creek which soon followed, Gen. Marston's command were sharply engaged; and subsequently he participated in the attack at Drury's Bluff, having the command of his brigade in conjunction with some other troops.

The Eighteenth Corps, after retiring from Drury's Bluff, were ordered to Cold Harbor, where Gen. Marston with his command bore their full share in the series of struggles to dislodge the enemy from their almost impregnable position. In one attack, the General's brigade lost in killed and wounded, within the space of half an hour, no less than five hundred men.

Gen. Grant having resolved on a flanking movement sent forward the Eighteenth Corps by water, and on their arrival before Petersburg they carried the enemy's works in front by assault, in which Gen. Marston with his command took part.

He was soon afterwards placed by Gen. Grant in charge of a considerable force stationed at various points along the James,—a position requiring great vigilance and discretion; and remained there until the following October, when he was assigned to the command of a division, in the forces under Gen. Butler. Here Gen. Marston was attacked with chills and fever, the result of long continued exposure during some movements in the swampy region near Richmond, and was obliged to quit the army on sick leave.

On his arrival in Washington he received intelligence that he had again been tendered the nomination for Congress, and at the following March election he was chosen for his third term. Upon the fall of Richmond and the cessation of hostilities, a month after, he resigned his commission in the army.

Gen. Marston served through his congressional term, with his accustomed fidelity, and then returned home to Exeter, where he now resides, engaged in the active practice of his profession.

GENERAL J. N. PATTERSON.

Gen. Patterson was born at Hopkinton, January 2d, 1835. He fitted for college at New Hampton, entered Dartmouth College in 1856, and graduated in 1860—paying his own way by teaching school winters. He was about to commence the study of a profession when the war broke out. Feeling that he had a duty to his country to perform, he enlisted as a private on the 22d of April, 1861, was appointed a recruiting officer, opened an office at Contoocookville, enlisted a company of seventy-two men, for three months' service, and took them to Portsmouth on the 27th of May, where most of the men re-enlisted for three years. He was commissioned First Lieutenant of Company H, on the 4th of June, and promoted to Captain of the same Company on the 23d of May, 1862. He served continually with his regiment through the seven days' fight before Richmond, and was never absent from his command on a march, in a skirmish or battle during the four and a half years that his regiment served. He was in twenty-four engagements, battles and skirmishes, from the first Bull Run to the taking of Richmond, April 3d, 1865.

After the battle of Gettysburg the Second Regiment was sent to Point Lookout, Md., where it remained until April, 1864, guarding the depot of rebel prisoners. Capt. Patterson was appointed Provost Marshal for the district of St. Mary's, and placed in charge of all the prisoners, by Gen. Marston. He was appointed acting Major of the regiment on its arrival at Yorktown—Major Sayles being absent, wounded. After the battle of Drury's Bluff the regiment went to Cold Harbor with the Eighteenth Army Corps, and was engaged in that battle. The three years for which the men enlisted had now expired, and those who did not re-enlist, with all the commissioned officers, returned to New Hampshire to be discharged. Patterson remained in charge of the veterans and recruits, about three hundred in all.

On the recommendation of Gen. Gilman Marston, commanding the Brigade, and Major Gen. W. F. Smith, commanding the Eighteenth Corps, Capt. Patterson was appointed Lieut. Colonel, June 21st, 1864. He was commissioned Colonel of the Second Regiment Jan. 10th, 1865, but there not being the requisite number of men he could not be mustered until June, 1865, when about three hundred men from the Tenth, Twelfth and Thirteenth Regiments were joined with those of the Second, making it up to one thousand strong. At this time many regiments were mustered out, and the three brigades in the Second Division were consolidated into two, and one of them placed in command of Col. Patterson, by order of Gen. Devens, commanding the Division.

On the 10th of July, 1865, the Second Regiment was ordered to Fredericksburg, Va., and Col. Patterson was assigned to the command of the sub-district of the Northern Neck, with headquarters at Warsaw. Here he remained until December, when he was ordered with his regiment to City Point, to be mustered out of the service. In September, 1864, he was temporarily in command of the Third Brigade, Second Division, Eighteenth Army Corps, and commanded it in the action of Williamsburg Road, Oct. 27, 1864. Col. Patterson was appointed Brevet Brig. General, to date from March 13, 1865, for "bravery in battle and good conduct throughout the war," and most worthily was the rank bestowed.

Gen. Patterson was mustered out with the Second Regiment, Dec. 19, 1865, having served four and a half years; returned to New Hampshire; settled at Concord; married Miss Sarah C., daughter of Rev. Dr. N. Bouton, of that city, in March, 1867, by whom he has one son; was appointed United States Marshal for the District of New Hampshire, which office he now holds, and discharges his duties, as he did all in the army, most creditably.

COLONEL EDWARD L. BAILEY.

Col. Bailey, of Manchester, was commissioned Captain of Co. I, Second Regiment, June 4, 1861, which position he filled to the acceptance of men under and officers over him, until the 26th of July, 1862, when he was promoted to Major. On the 23d of October of the same year he was promoted to Lieut. Colonel, and on the 18th of April, 1863, to Colonel of the Regiment. He was slightly wounded at the battle of Gettysburg, July 2, 1863. He returned to New Hampshire with the Regiment at the expiration of its term of enlistment, and was mustered out of service June 29, 1864. Col. Bailey was in command of the Regiment during the battle of Gettysburg, and Brigadier General Graham, under whose eye it fought, conferred a well merited compliment upon its commander for the cool, gallant and efficient manner in which he handled and fought his regiment on that most trying occasion.

MISS HARRIET P. DAME.

No history of the Second New Hampshire Regiment would be complete without it contained more than a passing notice of Miss Harriet P. Dame, of Concord. She offered her services before the regiment left the State, and though not quite ready to go to Washington when they did, she soon joined them there, and was ever afterwards regarded as one of its most brave, patriotic, honored and beloved members. A lady writes the author asking that Miss Dame may be suitably mentioned here, and says: "She stepped forth, moved with a great purpose, and offered her life for her country. Such true heroism is unparalleled and unprecedented in the history of any country. She was more than the 'Florence Nightingale of America,' because she had not the secure protection of hospital, but stood with our soldiers beneath the rain and fire of bullets, undaunted. She knew no fear, and thought not for a moment of her personal safety, for God had called her, and she felt that His divine protection was over all."

Words are too poor and a few pages too circumscribed to do her anything like justice. Her good deeds are enshrined in the memory and hearts of thousands who, but for her timely and tender care, would be numbered with other thousands who, for want of it, died upon the field of battle from wounds, and in hospital from disease incident to the exposures and hardships of war.

Rev. J. W. Adams, Chaplain of the Second from December, 1863, furnishes the following beautiful tribute to Miss Dame:

My personal acquaintance with Miss Dame commenced in the winter of 1863, when I received my commission, and joined the renowned "Old Second," at Point Lookout, Md. Even then her praise was in all the New England Regiments. Many who had unexpectedly recovered from sickness and wounds, had arisen from the sufferer's cot to call her blessed.

The exploits of heroic men were not related with more enthusiasm, nor with half the satisfaction with which her deeds of sympathy were rehearsed. Her name could hardly be mentioned in a New Hampshire regiment without calling forth the response, "I owe my life to Miss Dame." Though nominally connected with my regiment, our boys were not permitted the entire monopoly of her fame. All the Granite State regiments in the armies of the Potomac and James spoke her name and referred to her acts with equal pride. I have heard them tell how she toiled day after day on the bloody field of Gettysburg, sometimes, during the battle, between the lines, and once a prisoner in the hands of the enemy, still absorbed and self-forgetful, devoting herself to the relief of our wounded men. And when the darkness of night, and the exhaustion of her energies made rest imperative, she would pillow her head upon the gory field, and sleep amid the dead and wounded scattered around her.

During the winter of 1863 she had charge of the New Hampshire Soldiers' Relief Rooms in Washington, from which she frequently went forth on tours of inspection, that she might the more judiciously distribute the substantial aid and comfort directed to this channel, from the good people at home.

When the Army of the James was organized for the campaign of 1864, she arranged to leave her charge in Washington, and follow its destinies. She was a better general than McClellan, for she always managed to have a good stock of supplies, and was ready to move at a moment's notice. She also had the rare faculty of arranging the forces under her charge, and of leading off in the execution of her own plans. She was an incessant worker herself and kept every body around her at work. If she were to frame a ritual, she would be quite sure to have in it something like this: "From empty titles and hollow pretensions,—Good Lord deliver us. From kid-gloved nurses who stand by the bedside of human suffering, merely simpering, my good fellow I pity you,—Good Lord deliver us."

During the sanguinary conflict at Cold Harbor, she established herself at White House, rendering great service to our soldiers, who suffered severely. It was here that Capt. Smith died, and here too, a few days after the original volunteers of the Second embarked for home to be mustered out, leaving the re-enlisted veterans and recruits to add new luster to the fame already achieved by this noble regiment. Miss Dame remained with us, caring for our sick and wounded, until we all swung around in front of Petersburg.

In the Eighteenth Army Corps field hospital, at Broadway Landing, she could be seen to advantage—one moment distributing garments, comfort-bags, cordials, &c., from her private tent, at another moving under the large cooking tent, surrounded with delicate and substantial articles of diet, and the large kettles steaming with wholesome and palatable food in a state of preparation. This tent was her throne; but she did not sit upon it. From this place she issued her orders, dispatched her messengers, and distributed luxuries to thousands. Here she not only ruled with system, but with sleeves rolled up, toiled harder than any of her assistants.

In visiting my sick men in the hospital, and in procuring such articles of comfort as were necessary to keep the partially indisposed from following them, I had occasion to call on Miss Dame quite frequently. Her first inquiries would generally be—"Well Chaplain, how are the boys at the front? Are any of them sick? When are they going to get their pay? Is there anything I can send them that will do them good?" Many a can of condensed milk, beef tea, preserved fruit, with Jamaica ginger, blackberry syrup, farina, corn starch, and under garments for those who had none to change, stockings, mittens &c., &c., have I received from her to distribute among the feeble ones who did not wish to leave the front, and who had not seen the paymaster for six or eight months. She understood the importance of having the soldier keep up his correspondence with home; and the destitute never lacked for a postage stamp to forward his missive, if she could supply it.

After having compassed the rebel capital on all sides during her three years of active service on the field, and in the hospital, it was her privilege to join our regiment soon after it entered the city of Richmond. And right well she enjoyed it, for a more patriotic heart than her's never beat. But even now, and here, her ministrations were needed, and were cheerfully offered. When the excitement of war had passed away and no longer quickened the pulse or braced the nerve, many of our men found themselves victims of chronic diseases and broken-down constitutions. Many a soldier who had for three years looked wistfully toward home, and now confidently expected to reach it in a few weeks, or months at most, must lie down upon the bed of sickness, and turn his face the other way to follow the beck of Death, who was still busily engaged in opening graves in the distant South. From her headquarters at our regiment, she visited our own men, and those of other regiments, cheering the sick and desponding by her presence, and alleviating distress by skillful nursing, and substantial benefactions.

On the 10th of July, 1865, our regiment was sent by cars to Fredericksburg. Miss Dame accompanied us. Owing to the destruction of the track, we were left as night came on, two miles below the city. The sick men occupied one freight car, Surgeon Stone and myself another, and Miss Dame, among piles of baggage, made her home in the third. But she seemed to think she was highly favored to have a rude freight car so much to herself, and was only anxious to make the sick ones as comfortable as possible. One man she sent to the nearest farmhouse for milk and other things that were needed, and others in other directions, so that the hospital was soon in tolerable running order. From Fredericksburg she went to Washington; and soon returned with fresh supplies, to resume her duties. On the 27th of July, after the headquarters of the regiment had been moved to Warsaw Court House, she took the steamer for that place, where in a few weeks she finished the prosecution of her mission in person.

The question is sometimes asked, "Was there not something indelicate in such familiar association with society composed entirely of men? And did she not subject herself to insult from the rude soldiery?" It is wholly gratuitous to say that the military authorities would have shielded her. She had no need of this. Her devoted spirit, discreet bearing, and holy mission, were all the protection she needed. A mother could be no safer with her children, nor a sister safer with her brothers, than was Miss Dame among the New Hampshire soldiers. If we may suppose that one could be so thoughtless, as by word or deed to offend, a single word from her would have put every sword and bayonet of the command between her and the offender; and diminish his chances of life, by as many times as there were men in the command.

Two or three times during the war, her tent, with most of her personal effects, was destroyed by fire, by which, and in other ways, she sustained a loss of hundreds of dollars.

Of hardships, dangers, and losses, she never complained. But she was always ready to complain for the needy, and of those who were recreant, as the agents of other's charities.

The State has given but a faint expression of its obligations to this most practical and efficient of all its heroic female representatives in the War of the Rebellion. She deserves a monument, but does not need one. Her noble deeds are engraved upon the memories of thousands, whose children and children's children will rehearse them as among the most beautiful that adorn the annals of our military history.

The Second Regiment left Portsmouth by cars on the morning of the 20th of June, 1861, and arrived in Boston about twelve o'clock, where they were received at the Eastern Railroad station by an association of the Sons of New Hampshire, to the number of about fourteen hundred, headed by the Boston Cadets, and accompanied by Gilmore's Band, all under the marshalship of Col. O. A. Brewster, formerly of Hanover. The procession marched through Blackstone, Commercial, State, Court, Tremont and Winter streets to Music Hall, where a sumptuous collation was spread. The streets all along the route were crowded with spectators, who cheered the troops at every step. Haymarket Square was a literal sea of heads.

Music Hall was very appropriately and tastefully decorated. The galleries were occupied by the Sons of New Hampshire and the floor by the troops, and every seat in the hall was filled. Vociferous cheers were given as the different parties, Governor Berry and suite, and Ex-Governor Goodwin of New Hampshire, Governor Andrew, of Massachusetts, the Cadets, and the soldiers, arrived in the hall. The Marshal called the company to order, and after a blessing was invoked by Rev. Dr. Quint, then of Jamaica Plains, the eating commenced, at the conclusion of which Hon. Marshall P. Wilder, a native of Rindge, was introduced as the representative of the Sons of New Hampshire. He bade the regiment a hearty welcome. He reminded them of the revolutionary renown of their State, and of their patriotic Governor, John Langdon, who pledged his last cent for the good of the country. He said that war was a terrible crime; but that an attack upon the integrity of the Union more than justified it. The Stars and Stripes must be respected south as well as north of Mason and Dixon's line, and concluded by eloquently reminding Col. Marston of the importance of his trust.

Col. Marston responded, and said in substance that he could not find words to express his emotions of gratitude at the cordiality of the reception tendered his regiment. The scenes of this day will nerve our hearts to do all that man can do for the honor of New Hampshire, God bless her. We have not left our happy and peaceful homes for a war of conquest or oppression of anybody. We have taken up arms to preserve the freest and best government against the most causeless rebellion ever conceived. And we will do it! When this war commenced, some doubt was expressed whether the people of the free states, having always been engaged in the pursuits of peace, would be able to defend the Union; but the uprising of the whole North had settled that point. Massachusetts had been the first in the contest, as she was in the revolution. Many a tearful eye witnessed the march of the gallant Sixth of this State, in Washington, through Pennsylvania Avenue, hungry and fatigued, after the scenes in Baltimore, but as gallant and unsubdued a set of men as ever upheld the honor of any country. He said the Second New Hampshire Regiment was not composed of military men, but civilians, yet, if they were given work to do, he would answer for them, in the language of Colonel Miller, "We'll try, sir." Col. Marston was frequently interrupted during his remarks by the most enthusiastic cheers.

The regiment left Music Hall about half-past two, and marched to the Parade Ground upon the Common, where they were reviewed by Gov. Andrew and Staff, Gov. Berry, and Ex-Gov. Goodwin. The marching was admirable, better than that of any regiment that had left Boston for the seat of war, and was loudly applauded.

The review concluded, the regiment marched to the Fall River Railroad station, where they embarked on board the cars for New York. The train consisted of twenty-two cars, drawn by two heavy locomotives. At Fall River the regiment was transferred from cars to steamboats, and arrived at New York about eleven o'clock, A. M., on the 21st. They were warmly welcomed by the Sons of New Hampshire in that city, each of whom wore an appropriate badge. H. B. Perkins delivered an eloquent welcoming speech, as follows :

SONS OF NEW HAMPSHIRE:—A few weeks since the Sons of New Hampshire resident in this city, received with distinguished honors, the First New Hampshire Regiment, and to-day they are proud to recognize you as the worthy recipients of a like demonstration. In the name then, and in behalf of the Sons of New Hampshire, and of great and loyal New York, we bid you a most cordial welcome. It has been very truly said, that there have been men of a spirit so noble that, in serving their country, they had in view no motives of a selfish character, beyond, indeed, the satisfaction of having done so; and the time is not far distant, when all right thinking men will gladly recognize the brave soldiers who are now so heroically defending the honor of our country's flag, as belonging to their class of men; and when the Davises and the Beauregards of the South, shall be remembered as only they may be, whose names are written but in sand, and when the braves of the Crimea and the heroes of the Indies shall live only in brass and marble, the names of Scott, of Ellsworth, and of Butler, will be inscribed on our broad prairies—will be murmured in every brook—will be mirrored in every lake—and will be written in every valley and on every mountain peak, throughout the length and breath of our land.

Soldiers, yours is not an avenging, a devastating mission. You go forth to build up and to maintain our beloved Union—to preserve our nationality, and to save a bold, a reckless, and now a wretched, a piratical and rebellious people from a fate worse, I may almost say, than that of the fabled Ixion, who, for the murder of his own sister, was doomed to be perpetually spun upon a wheel, amid hissing serpents, and the burning lava-tide of hell.

Soldiers of New Hampshire! We, who were born and nurtured amid the same granite hills to which you have just bidden adieu—we whose kindred and friends are pillowed on her rocky bosom—we are proud of you to-day, and feel that the spirit of Stark and Langdon still lives and animates your bosoms. Onward! onward! then, shall be our motto, as we know it is yours; onward, until the demon of treason and disunion is crushed from our land (cheers), and Yankee Doodle and the Star Spangled Banner shall again thrill the hearts of a patriotic, a united, an invincible people. (Cheers.)

Charles Soule followed Mr. Perkins in a brief but eloquent speech, and presented an elegant silk flag—the same under which the regiment fought many of its hardest battles. It is now deposited in the rotunda of the State House, Concord, riddled with rebel bullets and missiles so that it would be difficult to recognize it as the same beautiful ensign which they received from the hands of their friends in New York. If it is tarnished by the fire and smoke of battle, and its folds torn by the shot and shell of the foes of the country, it never suffered dishonor. The speaker reminded the troops of the axiom that a consciousness of right always engenders strength, and asked them to see to it that every traitor at the South shall meet with a traitor's doom.

The following is a report, published in a New York paper at the time, of Col. Marston's reply :

The Colonel, Gilman Marston, listened to the addresses on horseback, and with uncovered head. His horse had stood meanwhile with little or no manifestation of uneasiness, but when his rider's voice was raised in response, the animal curvetted about considerably; the Colonel, nevertheless, spoke easily, and with as much dignity as his peculiar position at the time permitted, pausing for a moment and reining up his horse in front of the committeemen, as often as the impatient steed carried him beyond the formal position he had at first taken. During the delivery of his reply, he said that in behalf of the regiment and himself, he presented their united and grateful thanks for the kind welcome they had been given, and the gift of so beautiful a flag. The stars and stripes had always been a type of our Union, to uphold which they had left the comforts of home to undergo the deprivations and trials of war; but he hoped that, by the blessing of God, the Union would be maintained for transmission to other generations. He accepted the flag for the regiment, and pledged for them their devotion to it, and their determination to uphold it with all their strength.

The flag was then carried to the line, the Sons of New Hampshire formed into sections at the head of the regiment, whose band struck up a national air, when the regimental line broke into platoons, and the whole column moved up Broadway amid the applause and cheers of the thousands of spectators who crowded the streets and admired the stalwart appearance and soldierly bearing of the men. The officers dined with the committee of arrangements, at the Everett House, and the men were entertained at the Arsenal. In the afternoon the regiment departed for Washington, by cars, arrived there about noon on the 23d, and went into camp at Colorama Hill, about a mile north of the city.

While passing through New Jersey, Lieut. Charles W. Walker, of Co. B, fell from the cars and was so badly injured that he soon died. His remains were sent back to Concord where his funeral was attended by members of the Legislature and a large concourse of citizens.

The Second was brigaded with the First and Second Rhode Island and Seventy-first New York—all excellent regiments. Attached to the brigade was the Second Rhode Island Battery, and the Seventy-first New York had two Dahlgren howitzers, manned by two of its companies. Col. Ambrose E. Burnside, of the Second Rhode Island, was in command of the brigade.

THE BATTLE OF BULL RUN.

On the 16th of July the regiment started on its first campaign, with full ranks. Men who for weeks had been on the sick-list, now reported themselves for duty, lest they should be left behind in what they fondly believed would be the death blow of the rebellion. It was a very hot day, and many of the men, overcome with heat, fell out by the way. The brigade bivouacked for the night at Bailey's Cross Roads. The next day, late in the afternoon, they entered Fairfax Court House with banners flying and bands playing, and the brigade stacked their arms on the village green, while the colors of the Second were displayed from the cupola of the court house. Among the captures made here was a rebel mail, containing on paper many evidences of Southern prowess. The march was resumed early on the morning of the 18th. In the afternoon the roar of cannon and musketry was heard, and several wounded men coming back created the most intense excitement, by their reports, among the troops at the rear. The Second went into camp near Centerville, the spirits of the men being at fever heat, where they remained until one o'clock on the morning of the 21st, when they again moved forward. At daylight they were leading Hunter's Division on the way to Bull Run. At half-past nine o'clock the enemy was discovered in strong force ahead. Half a mile further on the Rhode Island regiment filed into the fields on the left, while the Second kept on up the road. They had just entered the shade of a wood when a cannon ball came screaming and crashing through the trees overhead, followed immediately by others, and fierce volleys of musketry. The excitement was now unbounded; all superfluous baggage was thrown off, and a rapid movement launched the regiment from the woods upon the battle field of Bull Run, and it engaged in the fight. Col. Marston was wounded in the shoulder by a rifle ball, and was carried to the rear. His wound was hastily bound up, he returned to the field to lead his men, and was received by them with tumultuous applause.

The fighting was of the most desperate character. Regiments charged the enemy gallantly and with broken ranks came back to the rear to re-form and again advance. The battle continued until early in the afternoon, when the firing almost ceased, and Gen. McDowell rode down the line and informed the soldiers that a great victory had been won, which drew forth much cheering. The troops were in a very disorganized condition. Many regiments could not muster half their numbers, while the reserves were miles away. Rebel re-enforcements were brought by railroad and put into the field, to wrest from the Union army its dearly bought triumph. At the same time an unaccountable panic seized our troops, and while the frightened rebels were making rapid progress towards Manassas, many of the Union army were flying towards Washington. The Second formed upon the field in good order to meet the fresh troops of the enemy, and it was sent to the front to take the place of other regiments which were falling back in a disorganized condition. It filed down into the valley where it was exposed to a murderous fire, the men falling at every step. A halt was made behind a ridge for the purpose of re-forming the ranks, when it again advanced on its way up the hill, and came into position facing a rebel battery, posted by the ruins of some log houses, behind which a body of rebels kept up an incessant fire on the regiment, which soon caused it to fall back. At this time regiment after regiment of Johnston's men came from the woods, and moving in solid columns against the broken regiments of the Union army, swept triumphantly on, the whole force opposing them joining in the retreat that closed the first disaster on the first great battle field of the war.

The Second, with the rest of the brigade, continued the retreat until Washington was reached. After several days the loss of the regiment was reported to be seven killed, fifty-six wounded and forty-six prisoners. Of the latter many were supposed to have died upon the field, and of those reported killed two returned after a long confinement in rebel prisons. Capt. Hiram Rollins was severely wounded in the shoulder, in consequence of which he resigned Oct. 14, 1862.

Early in August the Second moved to Bladensburg, Md., about four miles from Washington, and with the First and Eleventh Massachusetts and Twenty-sixth Pennsylvania, formed a brigade under the command of Gen. Joseph Hooker. Here they remained about two months, drilling and learning the duties of military life. About the middle of October, Hooker's brigade was ordered to the lower Potomac, where the rebels had established a blockade of the river. Sickles' Excelsior brigade arrived, and with Hooker's formed a division, of which Gen. Hooker assumed command, leaving his brigade in command of Col. Cowdin, of the First Massachusetts regiment, and the division marched to Budd's Ferry, over the roughest of roads. They went into winter quarters, and passed the next few months in building corduroy roads, erecting comfortable winter quarters, and such amusements as camp life afforded. Early in the winter Gen. Patterson arrived with the Second New Jersey brigade. About the middle of February Gen. Naglee of Pennsylvania, an accomplished officer, was assigned to the command of the First Brigade. By reason of his strict discipline he very soon became unpopular with the men, who looked upon him as a tryant. He thought the guard house of the Second Regiment was altogether too comfortable quarters for prisoners confined there, and ordered Col. Marston to build a dungeon, without so much as a crack or an opening anywhere, so that it should be perfectly dark. The dungeon was built, and one day Gen. Naglee went over to inspect it, accompanied by the Colonel. "Where is the entrance," said the General, "and how do you get anybody into it?" "O!" said Col. Marston, "that is not my lookout. I obeyed orders to the letter! How do you like it?"

The General made no reply. The dungeon stood just as it was built until after the regiment left in the spring for the Peninsula.

On the 5th of April, 1862, the division broke camp, embarked on board of steamers for the Peninsula, and joined in the siege of Yorktown. About this time Gen. Naglee went to another division, and his place was supplied by Gen. Cuvier Grover, whom all soon learned to respect and love. This was a period of hard work, erecting fortifications, digging parallels and constructing corduroy roads and bridges. The parallels which Washington had built still existed, and mementoes of the revolutionary struggle were daily dug out of the soil, such as bullets, balls and bleaching bones. The site of Cornwallis' surrender, marked by a granite stone, was not accessible then, but was visited by thousands after the surrender of Yorktown.

Early on the morning of the 4th of May, Yorktown was abandoned by the enemy, and in an hour after the evacuation was known Hooker's division was marching in pursuit of them. So sudden was the movement that the men had to leave without rations, and were almost without food for two days. They marched straight through the deserted town, having first carefully removed or marked the position of the torpedoes with which the ground was thickly planted, and which had already in some instances exploded and frightfully mangled the soldiers who stepped upon them. Late in the afternoon a few wounded cavalymen, coming to the rear, announced that the rebels were a little distance ahead, in line of battle, on the Williamsburg road. The division, after a short halt to load their guns, toiled on into the darkness, over stumps and through swamps, until midnight, when the men threw themselves upon the ground to get a little rest for the coming contest.

THE BATTLE OF WILLIAMSBURG.

At an early hour, on the morning of the 5th of May, amid a cold, drizzling rain, the march was resumed, the men picking their way along the muddy road as best they could. Two miles brought them to the enemy's pickets, who greeted them with a few shots, and dispositions were at once made for a fight. Company B, with Sharp's rifles, deployed forward as skirmishers, while the brigade formed in line of battle, with two regiments on each side of the road. The skirmishers commenced an advance, followed by the line, engaging the enemy's skirmishers, struggling through a heavy abattis, until the edge of the slashing was reached, when they took cover behind the fallen trees and stumps. In front was a broad undulating plain, and the spires of Williamsburg were seen in the distance. Between was a line of small redoubts, the largest called Fort Magruder, and mounted with guns commanding the road. There was also a line of rifle pits from each of which came a fire so well directed that several of our men, though well covered, were hit. For three hours things remained in this position, our troops looking for re-enforcements. At last a regular battery came up the road and took position in front of the line. The rebel guns at once opened upon the battery, and the gunners fled without firing a shot, amid the curses of the whole brigade, from which a company of volunteer artillerists was organized, under direction of the officers of the battery, and worked the guns so effectively that Fort Magruder was soon silenced. At this point a heavy force of rebels made an advance against the left of the line, which had been strengthened by the arrival of the rest of the division, and the battle commenced in earnest. The troops on the left fought bravely, but being unsupported gave way, which rendered the position of the right untenable, and Grover's brigade fell back to the edge of the woods. In the woods a skirmish line was formed and a fierce bushfight ensued, with varied results, for several hours. During this fight Capt. Leonard Drown, of Company E, a brave and noble officer, was killed. Lieut. David Steele, of Company G, with a few men of his company, encountered a squad of rebels of twice his own number. He dashed in among them, swinging his sword, and shouted at the top of his voice: "Surrender, you d—d scoundrels, or I will blow your brains out!" They at once threw down their arms and were made prisoners.

The guns at Fort Magruder, being relieved from the fire of our batteries, opened again, and were replied to by three Napoleon guns on our side, which poured a constant fire of grape and canister into the rebel ranks. Heintzelman, Hooker, and Grover were everywhere encouraging the men. The division held its ground until nearly dark, when Kearney arrived with his division, the tide of battle was quickly turned, and the rebels were driven from the field in confusion. The loss on the Union side, in this battle, was put down at fifteen hundred and seventy-five. The Second, from its position and manner of fighting, suffered less than those regiments which, in dense line of battle, were more exposed to the enemy's fire. Its loss was reported as eighteen killed, sixty-six wounded, and twenty-three missing. Capt. Evarts W. Farr lost his right arm, Lieut. Samuel O. Burnham was severely wounded, and Capt. Edward L. Bailey suffered an ugly contusion.

On the 6th the Second buried their dead and marked the graves the best they could, and cared for the wounded. The brigade moved near the town, and Gen. Grover was appointed military governor. They performed provost duty there for some time while the rest of the army moved up the Peninsula. The public buildings were filled with wounded rebels, who were well attended and cared for by the secessionists of the place. The brigade was finally relieved by a detachment of cavalry, and in its turn proceeded up the Peninsula, and joined the main body at Bottom Bridge, where the troops were waiting the order to advance. A day or two afterwards they moved to Poplar Hill, six miles from Fair Oaks.

THE BATTLE OF FAIR OAKS.

The battle of Fair Oaks commenced on the last day of May, 1862. On the second day of the fight Gen. Hooker took the two other brigades of his division and went to the assistance of Gen. Casey in that fearful battle. Gen. Grover's brigade, meantime, lay in line of battle, with the bridges of the intervening stream torn up, and artillery guarding the passage, expecting an attack; but the defeat of the rebels by Gen. Sumner secured them from all danger. On the 3d of June the brigade marched to Fair Oaks and relieved the Excelsior brigade in the trenches, where they remained twenty-four hours under arms, wet and shivering, without fire, surrounded by the putrifying corpses of men slain in the recent battle; the enemy's pickets, a few hundred yards in front, occasionally firing, which now and then increased almost to a volley, keeping the men continually on the alert, momentarily expecting a charge. When they were relieved they went into camp a short distance to the rear. The warm weather in a few days caused a horrible stench to arise, which with the hard labor, the miasma of the swamps and the bad water, soon seriously affected the health of the men.

The Sixteenth Massachusetts Regiment joined the brigade about the middle of June. On the 23d five companies of the Second, with a portion of the Sixteenth Massachusetts, drove in the rebel pickets. The rebels met the attack with a line of battle and re-established their picket line. Two days later the whole division went out, and after an obstinate fight forced back the rebel pickets and placed the Union pickets in their line. The First Massachusetts opened the attack, and were followed by company B, of the Second, which fought desperately, losing twenty-two killed and wounded out of forty-two taken into the fight. The whole regiment afterward went in and lost about seventy men during the day.

On the 26th and 27th of June were fought, on the north side of the Chickahominy, the bloody battles of Mechanicsville and Gaines' Hill, which resulted in withdrawing the whole army to the south side of the river, and was the beginning of the memorable "Seven Days' Fight," and the retreat to the James River.

THE SEVEN DAYS' FIGHT.

On the morning of the 28th of June Gen. Hooker's division was under arms and on the retreat. Every article that could not be carried was burned or otherwise destroyed. The retreat was well covered, and before the next morning the Union forces were safely across White Oak Swamp, with the bridges over the creek destroyed. On the morning of the 29th a line of battle was formed, in a huge semicircle extending from the Swamp to Charles City Cross Roads, Hooker's division being at the latter place with a strong picket thrown out toward Richmond, while the enormous wagon train moved on toward Harrison's Landing. The enemy came up and engaged the right of the line during the forenoon, but it was not until three o'clock in the afternoon that firing commenced on Hooker's front, when a fierce battle ensued. The Second took a position in rear of the Massachusetts Sixteenth, and the battle went on till night, with varied fortune, when the Second moved further to the right, ready for an attack. None came, however. During the night the most hideous groans and shrieks were heard, from the wounded—mostly rebels—between the two contending lines. Before morning the army was again in motion toward Malvern Hill, and before sunrise was in position for the last great battle of the retreat. The enemy soon appeared. Heintzelman's corps was posted on the left center, and as soon as the line was established the men went to work throwing up intrenchments, and the Second was soon sheltered behind a nearly bullet-proof wall of decayed trees and broken limbs. An attack was made and the battle raged furiously along the right of the line. Three hundred pieces of artillery, including heavy siege guns, and those of one or two gunboats on the river to the left, poured a tremendous fire into the lines of the advancing rebels, and wherever they made desperate endeavors to break the Union lines they were terribly repulsed. While the boys of the Second were filling the chinks in their breastworks, and making other preparations to meet an attack, the Surgeon said to Col. Marston, "Your men have got a good position." "Yes; my boys are great on intrenchments," replied the Colonel. "Do you think you will be attacked?" "Well, we may be; they are at it pretty brisk on the right." "How many men would it take to drive you out of here?" "How many? Well, six thousand might, possibly, but five thousand would get killed doing it." The pluck of the boys would have made good the Colonel's words, had there been occasion to display it. The position of the Second was unassailed, and the regiment witnessed one of the most magnificent battles of the war.

July 2d the army moved slowly along through rain and mud towards Harrison's Landing, leaving the enemy so badly cut up that he could not pursue. On the morning of the 3d a rebel light battery came up and threw a few shells into the camp of the army; but it was captured shortly after, by a force sent out for that purpose. Arrived at Harrison's Landing, defensive works were constructed in a few days that would defy the whole confederacy, and the troops enjoyed a season of rest.

Gen. Hooker devised a plan for the capture of Malvern Hill, which was occupied by a few hundred rebels. This plan being approved by Gen. McClellan, on the 4th of August the expedition set out, and by a circuitous route reached Charles City Cross Roads. Silence was enjoined upon the men, and the inhabitants had been put under guard that they might not carry the news to the rebels, and thus, without noise the division bivouacked for the night, almost within pistol shot of the enemy's pickets. At early dawn the movement commenced, and but for the failure of Gen. Patterson to take possession of the Richmond road, the escape of the rebels would have been completely cut off. As it was, they all got away but about a hundred men, and Hooker's division occupied Malvern Hill. A large force was sent from Richmond to re-take it, and Hooker was re-enforced by the divisions of Couch and Sedgwick; but in compliance with orders, two days afterward, the whole force returned to Harrison's Landing.

On the 16th of August Harrison's Landing was evacuated. The division reached Yorktown on the 21st and embarked on steamers for Alexandria, arriving there on the 23d. Thus ended the famous Peninsula Campaign, in which Gen. Hooker's division won an imperishable fame, and the New Hampshire Second, a part of it, had its full share of hard marches and bloody battles, making for itself a most noble record.

While at Alexandria the Second received fifty volunteer recruits. On the 25th of August the division was placed on freight cars and sent to re-enforce Gen. Pope, and went into camp at Cedar Creek the next day. On the 27th the division was on its way back to Manassas Junction. The rebels were found in line of battle at Kettle Run, near Bristoe Station, who, after a short battle, retreated toward Manassas, followed by Hooker. At night the division bivouacked within a mile of the Junction, where the light of the fires could be seen with which Gen. Jackson was destroying the stores he had captured, preparatory to evacuating the place.

SECOND BATTLE OF BULL RUN.

On the morning of the 28th Reno's division, of Burnside's corps, came up, and after a short rest moved on to Manassas, which the rebels had left for Centerville. Hooker advanced and bivouacked for the night at Blackburn's Ford. On the morning of the 29th cannonading was heard far away at the northwest, indicating that Stonewall Jackson was engaging some part of the Union force. Hooker at once started with his division for the scene, which he reached about noon. Grover's brigade was temporarily assigned to Sigel's command, whose position was in the center of the line. The scene was familiar to the men, for it was the old battle ground of the first Bull Run, where many of them had received their initiation into scenes of bloody conflict.

The brigade was massed near the village of Groveton, and in about two hours was ordered to charge the enemy in the woods. The first line of rebels lay in a railroad cut, and with the Second in the center of the line, the brigade moved forward at the order, steadily and noiselessly. Suddenly the rattling of thousands of muskets broke the stillness, and a shower of bullets tore through the air. Gen. Grover gave the order to "charge!" and with a yell every man dashed forward.

In a moment the railroad was carried, and the rebels, who had delivered their volley in a prostrate position, were taken prisoners before they had time to rise. The brigade dashed on for the second line, which rose and received them with a volley, but instantly the Second was in their midst, and the line broke and fled. A third line of rebels still remained, and the regiment pressed on, when the line seemed about to break, and the victory almost gained. The regiments on the right and left had not advanced so far, owing to greater obstructions in the ground, and at the very moment when success seemed ready to crown the assault, the Second was greeted with a murderous volley from either flank, and with hardly men enough remaining to form a skirmish line, they turned and started for the railroad, barely escaping capture, and leaving their wounded in the hands of the enemy. Capt. Joshua F. Littlefield, of Company B, a brave officer, was left on the field with several wounds, and finally died. He had received the appointment of Lieut. Colonel of the Eleventh Regiment, and though not obliged to do so, chose to accompany the regiment and partake in all its dangers until he left it for his new position. Lieut. Sylvester Rogers, of Company G, was wounded in the knee and back, and died while being carried from the field.

Shattered and bleeding, the brigade emerged into the field whence it started, and was hastily re-formed behind a little ridge, to await the counter charge which was expected. It soon came, and though the enemy was received with a well-directed volley, and there was a well sustained fight for a few minutes, yet the decimated ranks could not withstand the overwhelming numbers poured against them, and the line fell back to the hill on which our batteries were posted. With exulting cheers the rebels followed, but one of the Union batteries poured in such a deadly fire of grape and canister, that the cheers soon stopped, and the line melted away as if the ground had opened to swallow it.

The remnant of the brigade was now gathered together by the side of Bull Run Creek, and an estimate of losses was made. The Second entered the fight with three hundred and thirty-two men. Of these sixteen were reported killed, eighty-seven wounded, and twenty-nine missing. Of the latter by far the greater number were never heard from. Ten out of twenty-one commissioned officers were killed or wounded. Besides those mentioned above, Lieut. Norton R. Moore, of Company F, was killed; Lieut. John F. Holman, of Company H, received a terrible wound in the thigh; Lieut. John D. Cooper, of Company H, was shot through the lungs, and Lieuts. Ballard, Roberts, Steele, Young and Gordon, were wounded more or less severely. That night the division slept just in the rear of the Union batteries, on the identical spot where the Second had formed its line of battle in 1861.

On the afternoon of the 30th, the battle was renewed against that part of the line held by McDowell, and soon extended along the whole line. Hooker's division was called up to repel an attack, which proved to be only a feint, and was then ordered to "the other hill." Every thing seemed to indicate that the second battle of Bull Run was like the first—a rebel victory.

That night the army fell back to Centerville, in good order. On the 1st of September the rebels attempted to get possession of the road between Centerville and Fairfax, and the divisions of Hooker, Kearney and Stevens were sent to the threatened point. The battle of Chantilly ensued, and the rebels were driven back; but Kearney and Stevens were both killed. In this battle the Second had no more active part than to cover a road over which the Union trains were crowding towards Washington.

Two days later the division arrived at Alexandria, and for a time formed a portion of Gen. Banks' forces in the defenses of Washington, while the rest of the army was engaged in the movement which terminated so gloriously at Antietam. Gen. Hooker was assigned to the command of McDowell's Corps, and the command of the division devolved upon Gen. Sickles. Gen. Grover left the brigade for a more important command, about the same time. The loss of both Hooker and Grover was deeply regretted by the division. The camp was removed to Fairfax Seminary, and until the 1st of November the picket and fatigue duty performed by the regiment was very arduous. At this time the division was ordered to guard the railroad from Manassas to Alexandria, and was much scattered. The Second was in comfortable quarters at Centerville, with but light duty to perform, and the time passed pleasantly.

On the 18th of November the division started for Falmouth, to join the army now commanded by Gen. Burnside, and arrived there in ten days. Gen. Stoneman commanded the corps, and a new division, under Gen. Whipple, had been added to it, while the corps was assigned to the Central Grand Division of the army commanded by Gen. Hooker.

THE BATTLE OF FREDERICKSBURG.

The object of the concentration of troops at Falmouth was to take Fredericksburg, on the opposite side of the Rappahannock river. Gen. Burnside's plan of attack was laid before the President, Gen. Halleck and the Secretary of War, and approved by them. The rebels expected our army would cross at a different point, and therefore this one was not as strongly guarded as it otherwise would have been. On the night of the 10th of December the work of laying pontoon bridges across the river was commenced and two-thirds completed, when daylight appeared and the rebels discovered what was going on. Their sharpshooters at once opened upon our engineer party from the houses, and the men fell dead as fast as they took their stand upon the boats. Attempts were made to dislodge the sharpshooters by our riflemen, but in vain. They were too well protected. One hundred and forty pieces of our artillery opened from the Falmouth side of the river upon the part of the town from which the sharpshooting proceeded. This had no effect, and it was evident that the bridges could not be completed until they were in some way dislodged.

The Michigan Seventh volunteered for the hazardous duty of crossing the river in boats to dislodge the rebel sharpshooters. They were watched by thousands as they rowed across the river, and many of the men were shot. But they gained the shore, gallantly charged up the steep slope, drove the rebels out of the rifle pits and out of the buildings fronting the water. The Nineteenth and Twentieth Massachusetts followed the Michigan regiment, and they together held the ground until the bridges were completed. While this was going on the rebels were concentrating their forces at Fredericksburg.

In the afternoon the division crossed the river at the lower bridge and lay in the streets of the town. On the 13th, the day of the main assault, the Second, with several other regiments, was assigned to the duty of guarding the bridges and to keep men from crossing the river and shirking their duty. About midnight they were relieved and joined the brigade at the front, within range of the enemy's pickets. A battery was brought up and commenced shelling the brigade, when Company B, with its Sharp's rifles, was sent to shoot the gunners and horses. The battery, after the loss of a few men, retired.

The rebels were very strongly entrenched upon the heights back of the town, and many abortive attempts were made to dislodge them. The fighting upon the left was furious, and during the charge made by one of our brigades an entire North Carolina regiment was taken prisoners. During a furious artillery duel, in which the New Hampshire battery was hotly engaged and lost several men, Gen. Bayard, the youngest general in the service, was killed.

At one time Gen. Meade's division made a most gallant charge, reaching the very crest of the hill. They drove two of Hill's brigades back upon their second line of defenses and captured several hundred prisoners. For a time it seemed as if the battle was in our favor, but a large body of rebel infantry came rushing down from their second line of defenses and bore our brave charging lines before them. The day was lost, and thousands of our soldiers lay dead upon the hills. The rebel works were still unbroken and swarming with men. The battle of Fredericksburg was over. During this contest about a dozen of the men of the Second Regiment were wounded, but none fatally.

The next afternoon a council of generals was held at Gen. Burnside's headquarters, and after much discussion it was decided to retreat across the river, under the cover of darkness. Late on the afternoon of the 15th the order to re-cross the river was given, which was accomplished during the night, without disaster. The night was so dark and rainy that the movements of our army could not be seen, and so windy that the rumbling of our trains could not be heard by the enemy.

The last of January Gen. Burnside was relieved from the command of the army, and Gen. Hooker put in his place. Grand divisions were abolished, and corps badges were adopted; that of the Third being a diamond or lozenge, with red, white and blue colors for the respective divisions, in their order.

On the 26th of February the Second Regiment was ordered to report to Gen. Wool, commanding the department of the East. At Boston the regiment was most heartily welcomed and feasted and toasted at Faneuil Hall. At Manchester the men met a most warm and gratifying reception. They were escorted to Smyth's Hall, where tables were profusely spread with eatables. The galleries were filled with ladies and friends of the men in the regiment. Mayor Theodore T. Abbott welcomed the regiment in a feeling and appropriate speech, which was responded to by Lieut. Colonel Bailey. After the eating had been finished Hon. Frederick Smyth was introduced as toast-master, when sentiments and short speeches, by men of the regiment and citizens, followed. The next day the regiment was received at Concord, by a grand procession, dinner at the hotels and speeches of welcome. Gen. Wool was there to add to the interest of the occasion.

The headquarters of the regiment were established at Concord, while Companies D, E and K, were sent to Fort Constitution, Portsmouth harbor. The men were granted furloughs to visit their homes, many of whom did not return until long after their time had expired. The Seventeenth regiment, numbering about one hundred and fifty men, was consolidated with the Second, the officers having been first discharged. Col. Marston was promoted to Brigadier General, and Lieut. Colonel Bailey, Major Carr and Capt. Sayles were promoted to fill the vacancies consequent on this promotion.

On the 25th of May, 1863, the regiment left the State for Washington, arriving there on the 28th, where it remained until the 11th of June, when it moved and joined the army of the Potomac at Hartwood Church, and was assigned to the Jersey Brigade, to which it was attached as long as it remained with the army of the Potomac.

THE BATTLE OF GETTYSBURG.

The brigade arrived at Emmettsburg on the first of July, and encamped for the night, having heard firing all the afternoon in the direction of Gettysburg. At two o'clock on the morning of the 3d, the brigade set off and reached the scene of action early in the forenoon, and joined its corps. The brigade was commanded by Col. Berlin. It moved up the slope into the open field, when a rebel battery opened upon it with shell, one piece hitting the color-staff of the Second Regiment, wounding several of the color-guard. The brigade was withdrawn to a grove, while a battery went into position and rapidly replied to the rebel guns, and which the brigade was ordered to support. On the crest of the ridge, in a peach orchard, was a battery of six Napoleon guns, which kept up a spirited response to the rebels who were pouring shell and spherical case into our lines with murderous effect. The Second was ordered to report to Gen. Graham, commanding a brigade in Gen. Birney's division, and by him ordered to the rear of this battery as a support. After the position was taken the roll of the Second was called, and only eight men were found absent from their places. The regiment was exposed to a more terrific artillery fire than it ever experienced before or since. The air was filled with the missiles of death and the leaves and branches of the peach trees were shorn as if by a tornado. The brave gunners did not flinch, though every discharge of the enemy's guns dealt death to their ranks or mowed down the ranks of the supporting regiment. Some shells came along the ground so closely as to wound half a dozen men at a time. Others exploded as they struck the cartridge-boxes, and the cartridges, set on fire, blew up like so many Chinese crackers. The conflict was going on vigorously from Round Top, on the left, to Cemetery Hill, on the right, increasing in strength and fury toward the point where the rebels were striving with every human effort to turn our left. Thus the battle proceeded until half-past four in the afternoon, when this battery was relieved by a regular battery of rifled guns, which was served with much less spirit than its predecessor. The enemy's fire at once increased, their infantry began to show themselves from behind the woods, and at their advance our skirmishers came pouring in. So threatening was the attack that the Lieutenant of the battery spiked his guns in expectation of their capture. At this point Col. Bailey asked permission to charge with the Second and check this advance, which was granted, and the men sprang to their feet with a loud shout, passed the battery, and drove the advancing enemy back to their lines, taking up a position on the Emmettsburg road. Here it was exposed to the enemy's artillery at short range, and to the fire of the line it had just driven, which had taken shelter in a ravine. Two rebel regiments commenced to advance by the flank across the field in front, but these were speedily forced to flee in confusion. A brigade then advanced in line opposite the Sixty-third Pennsylvania, which was formed on the right of the Second, and no fire seemed able to check them. Some of Company B's men, who were wounded, took a position behind an old farm house and poured a lively fire into the advancing ranks, aiming especially at their colors. Still it came on and the Sixty-third gave way. The regiment on the left also faced about and retreated, upon which the Second was in its turn compelled to retire. The ground was thickly strewn with dead and wounded of both sides. Gen. Graham was wounded and taken prisoner, and Gen. Sickles, who rode up amid the terrific storm, had his leg shattered by a shell, and was carried from the field.

The rebels gained a temporary advantage at this point in the line. The Third corps had been overborne by vastly superior numbers, when the gallant old Sixth Corps, out of breath and weary with a long march, but fresh in courage and spirit, made its appearance and pressed forward to take the place of the shattered and bleeding Third. The rebel force was hurled back, the lost ground recovered, and the sun went down on the second day of that gallant fight, with the rebel army beaten at every point, and the tide of secession throughout the country at its ebb.

When the Second Regiment rejoined its brigade it was but a sad remnant of what it had been a few hours earlier, when its roll was called, just before entering into the fight. Then twenty-four officers and three hundred and thirty men answered to their names. Of this number nineteen were known to have been killed; one hundred and thirty-six were wounded, and thirty-eight were missing, lying dead or wounded on the field, or prisoners in the hands of the enemy, making a total of one hundred and ninety-three, out of three hundred and fifty-four, or about three-fifths of the number engaged. All of the field officers were wounded; Major Sayles severely, with a bullet through his thigh, and left in the hands of the enemy, though so disabled that they did not carry him away; Capt. Metcalf and Lieut. Roberts were killed; Lieuts. Ballard and Dascomb died of their wounds within a few days; Capt. Hubbard was shot in the forehead and wandered into the rebel lines, where he died and was buried by some brother Masons; Lieut. Vickery was badly wounded, remained in the hands of the rebels till they retreated, and died on the 8th of July; Lieut. Patch was wounded in the abdomen, and died on the 10th of July; Lieuts. Perkins and Converse each lost an arm, and eight other officers were more or less wounded.

On the 3d there was hard fighting on the right, and the enemy made desperate attempts to break our lines at different points; but the Jersey Brigade lost no men. On the 4th, in the midst of a drenching rain, the men collected and brought in the wounded and buried the dead. It was a scene which will not soon be forgotten by those who participated in or witnessed it.

The rebels started for the Potomac, and Gen. Meade, who was appointed to the command of the army on the eve of the battle of Gettysburg, followed in pursuit, bringing the enemy to bay at Williamsport, before they could escape across the river. Our cavalry harassed the retreating column of the enemy, took and destroyed a portion of their pontoon train and captured several hundred prisoners. Gen. Meade ordered a charge on the evening of the 12th, which was to be executed the next morning at daylight, but in consequence of a dense fog it was delayed, and when the advance was finally commenced the enemy had made good their retreat.

On the 17th the division crossed the Potomac at Harper's Ferry, and thence followed the valley east of the Blue Ridge, with the rest of the army, while Lee moved up the valley of the Shenandoah. On the 26th the Second marched to Warrenton, where it was met by Gen. Marston, who had full authority to form a brigade of the Second, Fifth and Twelfth New Hampshire regiments, for duty at Point Lookout, where the Government was about to establish a general depot for prisoners of war. On the 2d of August Gen. Marston formally assumed command of the district of St. Mary's, in which Point Lookout was included. Twenty men from the Second and Twelfth were detailed as mounted scouts, whose duty was to scour the country, look out for contraband trade and prevent communication of the inhabitants with the enemy. These were pleasant days for the three New Hampshire Regiments. Capt. J. N. Patterson, of the Second, was appointed Provost Marshal of the District, and Capt. George E. Sides was an assistant in the same department, having immediate charge of the camp.

The prisoners were divided into companies of a hundred each, with one of their number selected as a sergeant in command. They had comfortable shelter, plenty of palatable food and ample accommodations for cooking, and all sanitary measures were carefully attended to. Many attempts were made by individuals to escape, and in February, 1864, an organized conspiracy to overpower the guard and break camp was discovered in season to frustrate it. But few succeeded in escaping. Applications to take the oath of allegiance and go north were frequent. Many of the prisoners desired to enlist in our army and navy, and two regiments were organized, known as the First and Second United States Volunteers, and officered by men promoted from the Second and other regiments in the district. These regiments afterward did good service at Norfolk, Va., and in Colorado, where they were sent against the Indians. Several also enlisted in the Second, and proved as brave and true soldiers as any who ever served under its colors.

On the 24th of February, 1864, the re-enlisted veterans of the Second left Point Lookout for New Hampshire on furlough for twenty days. On the 4th of April Gen. Hinks relieved Gen. Marston in command of the district, and on the 7th the Second started again for the Peninsula and reached Yorktown the next day. In three days over a hundred of the substitutes, who joined the regiment at Point Lookout, deserted, a majority of whom were captured and two of them tried, and shot on the 15th. This prompt action effectually checked desertions from the Second.

The Second and Twelfth New Hampshire and the One Hundred and Forty-eighth New York were brigaded together, under command of Gen. Wistar, and assigned to the Eighteenth Corps, commanded by Gen. W. F. Smith. On the 22d of April the brigade moved to Williamsburg, and remained there until the 4th of May, when it marched to James River and embarked for Bermuda Hundred. On the 8th of May a general advance was made toward Petersburg, and a considerable portion of the Richmond and Petersburg Railroad was destroyed. In this expedition the Second Regiment had one man killed and six wounded.

On the 12th another advance was made, this time in the direction of Fort Darling. The rebels were steadily pressed back until our army confronted the outworks of the Fort. The Tenth Corps charged and captured the enemy's works upon the left, while the riflemen of the Eighteenth drove the rebels from those upon the right, commanding the telegraph pike to Richmond. Gen. Hickman's brigade formed the extreme right of the line, and to its left was Gen. Wistar's brigade, across the pike, where a battery was posted upon the reverse side of the captured rebel works. Three hundred yards to the front was a strong rebel fort from which floated two flags. A half dozen log barracks just outside were occupied by rebel sharpshooters, who were driven from their cover by our skirmishers, who kept up such a fire from behind the logs and stumps, close under the fort, that not a head appeared along the whole rebel line. On the 14th and 15th the Second erected a breastwork of logs, in front of which, from stump to stump, telegraph wires were strung just high enough to trip an advancing enemy. Beauregard had concentrated his troops about Fort Darling. On the morning of the 16th a dense fog prevailed, and under its cover the rebels prepared for a grand charge to drive back the besiegers of the fort. Their lines were silently formed outside the works, and an attack was made upon the extreme right to turn that flank of our army. There were several companies, composed of young men, sent from Richmond for the emergency, who were brought directly opposite the line of the Second Regiment. When the mass of the charging rebels burst into sight they were met by a volley from the rifles of the regiment which had a terrible effect upon the ranks, while those who were left to advance were thrown to the ground, line after line, in windrows, by the telegraph wires upon the stumps, when the men of the Second leaped over their breastworks and used their rifles with the most deadly effect. In their desperation the rebels renewed the attack, with the same results. The ground in front of the breastworks of the regiment was literally coved with the rebel dead. The number killed in front of the Second's line was estimated at two thousand, while a rebel Lieutenant, who was taken prisoner, admitted it to be eighteen hundred, and said that the wire arrangement was "a d—d rascally contrivance." The Second lost but four men killed and fourteen wounded. Capt. James H. Platt, of Company E, was among the killed.

While Gen. Wistar's brigade was repulsing the enemy so handsomely, a strong force marched clear around Gen. Hickman's brigade, and suddenly poured in a volley from the rear. The brigade was very badly crushed, the men slaughtered, and the General wounded and taken prisoner. The right was thus turned, and the Second ordered to fall back, but again advanced and occupied the breastworks until the whole line was withdrawn and a new one established a short distance to the rear. The remainder of the day was passed in skirmishing with the enemy, and at night the army withdrew to Bermuda Hundred, was placed in a state of siege, and strong fortifications erected. The Tenth Corps were almost constantly fighting with the enemy, and the Eighteenth Corps frequently turned out and formed behind their works. On the 20th a severe fight was had over some of our advanced rifle-pits, in which the rebel Major Gen. Walker was severely wounded and captured.

On the 27th the division deserted the works, crossed the Appomattox on pontoon bridges, and marched to City Point, and on the 1st of June joined Gen. Grant's great Army of the Potomac.

BATTLE OF COLD HARBOR.

On the 1st of June the division of which the Second Regiment formed a part, guarded a wagon train to Gen. Grant's headquarters, and immediately pushed on to where the Sixth Corps was skirmishing with the enemy, about a mile beyond. The division was marched rapidly down the road, and precipitated into the fight. The Second, though not actively engaged, was under a heavy artillery fire, and lost several men. At early dawn on the 2d, the division advanced through the works behind which it had lain, and formed in the woods. Wistar's brigade was closed in mass by battalions, the Second being the fifth regiment in the column, and the Twelfth leading. The order to advance was given, and as the brigade emerged from the wood it was met by a terrible fire of artillery and musketry. The column dashed forward half the distance, when the Twelfth halted. The three intervening regiments broke, and the Second was thrown into confusion. The lines were again formed under cover of the woods, and the men threw themselves on the ground, and with hands, knives and bayonets, threw up little mounds of earth, for their protection, which were afterward elaborated into serviceable rifle-pits. Men were continually being wounded under the constant fire of the enemy. Capt. George W. Gordon was struck on the top of the head, and died an hour afterward. Capt. William H. Smith was shot through both legs, and died on the 7th. Lieut. Henry Hayward, while using the rifle of one of his men, was pierced through the neck with a bullet, and lived but a few hours. Sergeant Major M. L. F. Smith was shot through both thighs, and died in dreadful agony. The entire loss of the regiment during the day was seventy, and of these many had only a few days longer to serve. This was the last battle of the original Second New Hampshire, and it was fierce and severe enough to fitly crown three years of active service.

On the morning of the 8th the original men of the regiment who had not re-enlisted took leave of their comrades and departed for New Hampshire, arriving at Concord on the 17th, and were mustered out of service on the 21st.

About two hundred and fifty men, including those who had re-enlisted, and the recruits who had joined the regiment since its first organization, with Capt. J. N. Patterson in command, remained in the trenches at Cold Harbor. There were still upon the rolls of the regiment six hundred and sixty names, which, though not sufficient to admit of the muster of a Colonel, allowed the organization of ten companies to be retained. The muster of the other regimental officers, and the old organization and numerical designation were continued. Capt. J. N. Patterson was appointed Lieut. Colonel and Adjutant John D. Cooper, Major.

On the 9th of June the regiment was detached from the brigade and assigned to duty at the Eighteenth Corps headquarters. On the 12th the corps broke camp and marched to White House Landing, where the Second embarked for Broadway Landing, on the Appomattox. On the 16th, by order of Gen. Butler, it reported to Gen. Turner, and in company with other troops went on a reconnoissance, drove in the enemy's pickets, destroying two or three miles of the track of the Petersburg and Richmond railroad, captured and destroyed the camp of a North Carolina brigade, and marched back to Bermuda Hundred without loss.

The Second Regiment did duty at the corps headquarters until the 13th of August, when it was assigned to the First Brigade, First Division, Eighteenth Corps, Col. Aaron F. Stevens, Thirteenth New Hampshire, commanding, and was stationed in the trenches, on the right of the line, in front of Petersburg, where it was constantly under fire, and lost men every day, although there was no serious fighting.

On the 26th of August the Eighteenth Corps left Petersburg, crossed the Appomattox at Point of Rocks, and occupied the line of works, the Second taking its position in rear of Battery Sawyer, where it remained till September 1st, when it was ordered to proceed to Wilson's Landing, on the James River, and reported to Gen. Marston, then commanding the defenses of the James from City Point to Fortress Monroe. Here the regiment made many excursions into the enemy's country, and destroyed much property that was of value to the Confederate Government. On the 21st Major Cooper, with one hundred men, convoyed by a gunboat, went up the Chickahominy river, and destroyed a steam mill, in full working order. The detachment returned the next day, bringing with them over fifty thousand feet of lumber. Guerillas occasionally made their appearance and fired upon the party from the banks of the river, but inflicted no injury. On the morning of the 27th, at three o'clock, Lieut. Col. Patterson, with the Second, fifty men of the Sixteenth New York Heavy Artillery and twenty colored cavalry, left Wilson's Landing on board a large barge, towed by the gunboat Mosswood, proceeded up the Chickahominy to Hogg Neck, on the left bank of the river, where the party disembarked. The order was "to push into the country four or five miles, and sweep down to Barnett's Ferry, near the mouth of the river, gathering such horses, mules, cattle and sheep as might be useful to the army, and take along such colored men and their families as desired to come into our lines." Soon after landing a colored boy was found who was perfectly acquainted with that section of country, and he was taken along as guide. The force marched to Centerville, ten miles, halted for dinner, after which it marched to Gum Springs, James City County, and camped for the night. The next morning the command marched in the direction of Barnett's Ferry, passing several fertile farms, well stocked with cattle and sheep, of which they collected and drove to the Ferry one hundred and fifty, and embarked for Wilson's Landing, where they arrived in the evening, without loss or accident. Gen. Marston complimented the command very highly for the manner in which they had accomplished the objects of the expedition, remarking that his command had captured their share of the twenty-five hundred head of cattle which were stolen a few days before by Lee's Cavalry, below City Point.

On the 1st of October orders were received to proceed to Aiken's Landing, on the north side of the James, and report to Gen. Weitzel, commanding the Eighteenth Corps; and on the same evening the regiment embarked under command of Major Cooper, Gen. Marston having been relieved and ordered to turn over his command to the most experienced officer, and Lieut. Col. Patterson, though not the ranking officer present, was ordered to remain in command of the first separate brigade. On arrival at Aiken's Landing the regiment was assigned to the Third Brigade of its old division. On the 14th Lieut. Col. Patterson rejoined the regiment and took command of the brigade. On the 27th the Second took part in the reconnoissance made by the Eighteenth Corps, on the extreme right of the line, near the Williamsburg road, meeting the enemy in strong force, when some heavy skirmishing took place, in which the Second lost a few men.

About the middle of November the Army of the James was reorganized. The white troops of the Tenth and Eighteenth Corps were consolidated and called the Twenty-fourth, Major Gen. John Gibbon in command; and all the colored troops of the two corps were designated as the Twenty-fifth Corps, under Major Gen. Weitzel. The Second was assigned to the Third Brigade, Third Division, Twenty-fourth Corps, commanded by Col. Guy V. Henry, of the Fortieth Massachusetts. The brigade went into comfortable winter quarters, with plenty of wood and water, and remained there, with no important occurrence except an occasional alarm on the picket line, or a flank movement of the enemy on the right, until March 3d, 1865, when the brigade, now commanded by Brevet Brig. Gen. Roberts, received orders to report to Lieut. Gen. Grant, for secret service.

During the winter the Second received two detachments of recruits, Lieut. Col. Patterson was promoted to Colonel, and Major Cooper to Lieut. Colonel, and much attention had been paid to company, regimental and brigade drill. The discipline of the brigade was such that it was acknowledged to be the best in the Army of the James. Weekly inspections were instituted by the corps commander, at which the best regiment was excused from all outside duty for a week, and it was ordered that the neatest soldier in the division should receive a twenty days' furlough. At several inspections the Second was announced as the best regiment in the brigade, and several members had received furloughs as being the neatest and best soldiers in the division.

On the 4th of March the brigade left its pleasant, home-like camp with many regrets, for a march to Deep Bottom Landing, there to await transports and further orders. The march was six miles, through mud knee-deep and a heavy rain. After a few hours' delay the brigade embarked on board transports and about noon the next day arrived at Fortress Monroe. For several days after its arrival at Fortress Monroe, the brigade was engaged in raids into the enemy's country, collecting cattle, horses, mules, sheep, tobacco and other productions, destroying rebel property and harassing the enemy, in which the Second bore a part, without meeting with any loss of men. While on a raid, having landed at Point Lookout, a special messenger arrived from Gen. Grant, with orders to the officers in command of the expedition to proceed to White House Landing, on the Pamunkey river, and establish there a base of supplies for Sheridan's army, which had been traveling over the enemy's country for the previous three weeks, and was then on its way to the left of Gen. Grant's line. The command arrived at White House on the 14th of March, and it being the day of the New Hampshire election, the Second voted for members of Congress. Sherman's army arrived on the 18th, men and horses jaded and tired, and remained there for rest until the 24th.

Orders were received for the brigade to march back to the camp vacated by them on the 4th, a distance of fifty miles, and the line of march was taken, with Sherman's army in advance. The old camp was found to be occu-ped by a portion of the Twenty-fifth Corps, which had been withdrawn from the front. All the troops in the Army of the James being ordered by Gen. Grant to the left of the line at Petersburg, excepting the Third Division, Twenty-fourth Corps, and one division of the Twenty-fifth, which were to hold the lines, and to advance upon Richmond the moment Lee's lines were broken. The Second, being in the Third Division, was ordered to occupy Signal Hill.

On the 1st and 2d of April, terrific cannonading could be distinctly heard from the left, one continuous roar of artillery for hours, from which it was evident that Grant would no longer remain idle around Petersburg, and the morning of the 3d told surely of his success on the left, and of wonderful doings in front. The explosion of gun-boats and arsenals at Richmond was distinctly heard by the troops on the north of the James. The sun had for the last time risen upon the rebel capital.

The division immediately broke camp and started for Richmond, over abandoned rebel lines and forts, and an uninterrupted march of a few hours found the Second on the outskirts of the city, black with smoke and cinders from the fire then raging at its highest fury. The scene was wild and magnificent beyond description. "On to Richmond!" had at last been accomplished, and the fury of the flames that morning looked as though there ought never to be but ashes remain of that "impregnable city," the capital of the so-called "Southern Confederacy."

After a few days the Second moved into one of the forts overlooking the city. On the 25th the brigade crossed the river to Manchester, and encamped two miles from Richmond, on the road leading to the Cumberland coal mines. On the 21st of June the Tenth, Twelfth and Thirteenth New Hampshire regiments were mustered out of the United States service and left for home. The recruits, whose term of service did not expire prior to September 30th, about four hundred, were transferred to the Second, thus making the aggregate of the regiment nine hundred strong. Lieut. Col. J. N. Patterson was mustered as Colonel, Major John D. Cooper as Lieut. Colonel, and Capt. Levi N. Converse as Major. About one half of the regiments of the Third Division had been mustered out of service, and the remainder were formed into two independent brigades, and Col. Patterson was assigned to the command of the Second Brigade.

On the 10th of July the Division was broken up, and the various regiments assigned to the different sub-districts into which Virginia had been divided. Col. Patterson was assigned to Northern Neck division, which embraced King George, Westmoreland, Richmond, Northumberland and Lancaster counties, with headquarters at Warsaw. Companies A, F, and H, were left at Fredericksburg as provost guard, and the other seven companies went to Warsaw. To each of the counties of Col. Patterson's district one company was sent, the commanding officer of the company acting as provost marshal of the county, and assistant agent of the Freedman's Bureau. On the 22d of August another sub-district was consolidated with Col. Patterson's, and he was continued as commander of the whole.

On the 30th of October, Lieut. Col. John D. Cooper died of disease, at Baltimore, Md. He was one of the original members of the regiment, having enlisted as a private in the Goodwin Rifles, afterwards known as Company B, at Concord, in April, 1861. He rose by merit alone to the rank he held when he died. He was one of the bravest men in the regiment, and enjoyed the respect and confidence of all its members, as well as of a large circle of acquaintances in New Hampshire.

On the 2d of December the Second started for City

Point to be mustered out of the United States service, which took place on the 19th, and on the 21st started for New Hampshire. At Nashua, Manchester and other stations on their route the men were greeted with long and hearty cheers. They reached Concord at nine o'clock on the evening of the 23d, and marched to the hotels where a bounteous repast awaited them. On Monday, the 25th, a formal reception was given the regiment by Governor Frederick Smyth, and they marched through the principal streets of the city, escorted by the State Militia and the Veterans, who once had the honor of serving under its tattered banners. Arriving opposite the State House, after being reviewed by the Governor, speeches were made by Governor Smyth, Ex-Governor Gilmore, Adjutant Gen. Natt Head, Col. Walter Harriman, and Col. Peter Sanborn, which were handsomely and feelingly replied to by Col. Patterson. On Tuesday the 26th, the men were paid off and discharged. No New Hampshire Regiment was so long in the service, and none left a more honorable record for bravery and good conduct throughout the war than the Second.

The roll of the Second Regiment, during its organization, contained more than three thousand names. Every regiment but two from the State was supplied, in part, with officers from its ranks; and more than thirty regiments in the field had upon their rosters names of men that were once identified with it. It marched more than six thousand miles, participated in more than twenty pitched battles, and lost in action upwards of one thousand men.

The notice of the Second Regiment should not be closed without a mention of Miss Harriet P. Dame. She was connected with it, near or remote, during its whole term of service. Wherever the wounded, sick and suffering were, Miss Dame was always found, doing cheerfully her utmost for their relief. Many officers and enlisted men owe their lives to her unremitting care. Major Sayles, who was shot through the leg at Gettysburg, and Captains Perkins and Converse, who each lost an arm, say that through her exertions their lives were saved. She attended as kindly and carefully to privates who needed her care, as to officers of the highest rank, and is remembered by all with the affection due a mother or sister.

Much of the fame enjoyed by this regiment is due to the energy and zeal of General Gilman Marston. Although he was promoted to Brigadier General, and assigned to duty away from the regiment, he left it with regret and watched its fortunes with an unusual interest. A very strong attachment existed between him and his first command, from the commencement to the close of the war.

THIRD REGIMENT.

This was the second regiment raised in the State under the call of the President for three years troops. It was recruited, as the two preceding regiments had been, throughout the State, though Manchester furnished three companies. On the 31st of July, 1861, an order was issued by the Governor offering a bounty of ten dollars to be paid to each man who had, or might thereafter enlist and be mustered into the Third Regiment. The same order was carried into effect in recruiting for other regiments subsequently enlisted.

The men rendezvoused at Camp Berry, Concord, early in August, and between the 22d and 26th the companies were all mustered into the United States service, by Major Seth Eastman, of the regular army, consisting of ten hundred and forty-seven officers and men, including a regimental band of twenty-four pieces, under the leadership of Gustavus W. Ingalls, of Concord.

The following were the commissioned officers and the non-commissioned staff of the regiment during its term of service, and their record, as gathered from the Adjutant General's books, and from other sources.

All the field officers had had experience in the army, and some of them had been under fire. Col. Fellows was educated at West Point Military Academy, had held several commissions in the State Militia, and was Adjutant of the First Regiment. Lieut. Colonel Jackson served as Lieutenant and Captain in the Mexican war, was in several battles, and had held commissions—the highest that of Colonel—in the State Militia. Major Bedel also served in the Mexican war, having enlisted as a private, and rose to the rank of Lieutenant, by reason of meritorious conduct. They brought to their positions what was much needed at that time—knowledge of their duties in field and camp. The regiment was composed of good men, well officered, and the State expected from it much honor, as well as usefulness to the service, nor was it in any way disappointed.

COLONEL JOHN H. JACKSON.

Colonel Jackson is a son of John A. H. Jackson, of Portsmouth. He was born at that place on the 20th of October, 1814. He was appointed Lieutenant in the First Regiment New Hampshire Militia, in 1841, and rose step by step to be Colonel of the same in 1848. On the 9th of April, 1847, he was appointed First Lieutenant of the Ninth Regiment, United States Army, and accompanied his regiment on its march to the City of Mexico, being in all the battles in the Valley of Mexico, and was brevetted for gallant services on the 19th and 30th of August, 1847, at the battles of Contreras and Churubusco, and commissioned Captain Feb. 17, 1848. He was mustered out of service the following August. After the fall of Chapultepec, the Ninth Regiment pressed forward to the Aqueduct, under a shower of shot and shells. An escapee-ball hit Lieut. Jackson in the breast and glanced off to the ground. It struck a Bible he carried in his breast pocket, the gift of a sister as he left home. The Bible was deeply but obliquely indented by the ball, and to it he owed the preservation of his life. Col. Jackson was an inspector in the Boston Custom House from 1853 to 1861. On the 6th of August of the same year he was appointed Lieut. Colonel of the Third Regiment, and Colonel of the same on the resignation of Col. Fellows, in June, 1862, which position he held until Feb. 24, 1864, when he was honorably discharged. His life in the war of the rebellion, from August, 1861, to the date of his discharge forms a part of the history of the Third Regiment. On the 1st of January, 1867, Col. Jackson was appointed an Inspector in the Boston Custom House, which position he now holds. He was removed by Collector Goodrich, in 1861, and by him re-appointed to the same position in 1867, as a reward for services rendered the country.

GENERAL JOHN BEDEL.

General Bedel, of Bath, is a son of Gen. Moody Bedel. He was born on the 8th of July, 1822, at Indian Stream Territory, what is now Pittsburg. He was educated at Newbury, Vermont, Seminary, read law with Hon. Harry Hibbard, of Bath, and was admitted to the Grafton County bar in 1850. He enlisted as a private in the Ninth Regiment United States Infantry, March 25, 1847, and was soon promoted to First Sergeant of Company H. He was discharged at Vera Cruz, Aug. 8, 1847, on account of disability. Dec. 30, 1847, he was appointed Second Lieutenant in the same regiment, and served until August, 1848, when he was honorably discharged. For some years subsequent to the Mexican war he was clerk in one of the Departments at Washington. August 6, 1861, he was appointed Major of the Third Regiment, and at once entered upon the duties of his position, with great energy and industry. On the resignation of Col. Fellows, in June, 1862, Major Bedel was promoted to Lieut. Colonel; and while prisoner of war, April 6, 1864, to Colonel of the same regiment. He was wounded by a solid shot at Morris Island, on the 10th of June, 1863. He returned to duty on the 16th, and was captured far in advance of his men, in the night assault upon Fort Wagner, Morris Island, July 18, 1863, and was not paroled until Dec. 10, 1864—remaining in the hands of the enemy nearly seventeen months—was declared exchanged, at Annapolis, Md., March 31, 1864, and returned to his regiment at Wilmington, N. C., as Colonel, on the 11th of April, 1865. He was appointed Brigadier General United States Volunteers, by Brevet, “for gallant and meritorious services, to date from March 13, 1865.” He served with distinction through the war, and was mustered out with his regiment, July 20, 1865.

When taken prisoner, Gen. Bedel was carried to Richland County Jail and South Carolina Penitentiary, at Columbus, S. C. While the exposure of the prisoners confined here to the elements was not as severe as those confined at Belle Isle, Andersonville and Salisbury, they were almost continually threatened with being shot, hung, or exposed on the ramparts of Fort Sumter. The prisoners were kept in close confinement, robbed, starved, exposed to cold without fuel, shot at and shot into for attempting to escape, and then put in irons and solitary confinement for months, as a punishment. Col. Bedel was put in solitary confinement and so kept five months, from the 7th of March to the 7th of August, 1864, for not submitting with sufficient docility to his treatment. Capt. Shadrach T. Harris, of the East Tennessee Cavalry, was kept in irons twenty-six months, but they did not dare to carry their threats to shoot and hang him into execution. Col. Bedel probably suffered no more than others who were confined in the same prison, and perhaps not as much as some; but his sufferings from cold, hunger, solitude and threats of death in every shape, and his feelings when, after seventeen months of such confinement, he was paroled and sent into our lines, may be more easily imagined than described.

When the war was over, Gen. Bedel returned to his home, in Bath, where he still resides, and enjoys the confidence and respect of a large circle of warm friends and acquaintances. He represented his town in the popular branch of the Legislature in 1868 and 1869, and was the candidate of the democrats for Governor in 1869, receiving the full vote of his party. To him, as much as to any single man, belongs the credit of making the Third one of the most efficient, brave and honored regiment that went from New Hampshire during the four years' war of the rebellion.

By act of Congress of July 22d, 1861, the President was authorized to call for volunteers, not to exceed 500,000 in all. He gave Gen. T. W. Sherman authority to organize a secret expeditionary Corps. The Third New Hampshire Regiment was assigned to this corps, and was the first in the field.

On the 3d of September, 1861, the Third Regiment struck tents and took transportation for Camp Winfield Scott, on Long Island, N. Y., with ten hundred and thirty-one officers and men, fully equipped and armed with Enfield rifled muskets, where they arrived next day. The Band was full and excellent; the camp and garrison equipage abundant and substantial; the transportation—ninety horses and twenty-five wagons—of a superior quality, hardly surpassed by that of any volunteer regiment which took the field during the rebellion; the hospital department thoroughly organized and supplied with all the requisites for the preservation of the health of the troops; the means complete for preparing food for the men properly and speedily; nor were the means of mental and moral culture neglected. The regiment lacked nothing but that experience which every volunteer organization must acquire in the field before it is fitted for active campaigning.

Camp Winfield Scott was designed as a camp of instruction for the corps of sixteen or more regiments. The Third was the first to arrive and had its choice of quarters. In it were many officers and men who had previously seen service, which was a great aid in disciplining the regiment and instructing the men in acquiring soldierly habits.

Late on the 14th of September orders were received for the regiment to be ready in fifteen minutes to leave for parts unknown. It took cars accordingly, leaving behind all but arms and equipments, and at midnight on the 15th was landed at the depot in Washington, D.

C., and next day went into camp near the Congressional burying ground. The United States took possession of the tents, horses, wagons and camp equipage, and they were never returned to the regiment.

While at Long Island, the ladies of Hampton Plains had made arrangements to present the regiment with a stand of national colors, as a compliment to its discipline and good conduct, and a delegation of gentlemen was sent with it to Washington, where it was presented by Dr. Scudder, in behalf of the ladies. The source from whence it came and the cause of its presentation endeared it to every soldier in the regiment, and its rent, perforated and tattered folds, deposited in the State House at Concord, attest with what gallantry it was borne and guarded by its grateful recipients.

At Washington the Third Regiment was joined by the 8th Maine, and 46th, 47th and 48th New York, and together composed the First Brigade of Sherman's Division. The President visited the regiment and complimented it in very high terms for its fine appearance.

On the 4th of October the regiment moved to Annapolis, Md. While there Mrs. Gen. Veile, presented it with a stand of national colors, Gov. Hicks, of Md., speaking in behalf of the donor, as follows :

COL. FELLOWS—Dear Sir: Allow me to present to you and your command this rich emblem—a gift from the accomplished and patriotic Mrs. Brig. Gen. Veile.

Col. Fellows took the colors, unfurled them to the view of his command, and the large number of spectators, military and civil, who had been invited to be present, and responded as follows :

GOV. HICKS, GENTLEMEN, AND FELLOW-SOLDIERS—The First Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers (three months' soldiers), on their way to Washington passing through the city of New York, were met by a delegation of Sons of New Hampshire, residents of that city, and presented a beautiful stand of colors. I had the honor of being a member of that regiment, and we all felt very proud to receive the emblem of our nationality from such a source. We carried that banner with pride through that campaign. Being honorably discharged, we took it with us up to our home among the old granite hills of New Hampshire. Our country still bleeding, the call of duty was imperative, and this regiment was immediately organized; and on our way to the seat of war, we encamped a few days at Long Island, near the town of Hempstead, from which quiet village we had the honor and great pleasure of receiving a beautiful flag, as a testimony of respect, from the ladies residing there. What adds still more to the importance of that gift, is the fact that we did not stay long enough to have the flag finished, but received it in Washington, through a delegation of prominent citizens, headed by the Rev. Dr. Scudder.

During our stay in the city of Washington of about two weeks, a beautiful and accomplished lady in the person of Mrs. Brig. Gen. Veile appears in camp, like a bright oasis in a barren desert, remaining with her husband, our gallant Brigadier, long enough to observe some of the hardships of a soldier's life and appreciate his sacrifices; then quietly leaving her husband for her beautiful home on the shore of Long Island, and us in forgetfulness as we supposed; but no, though far away she still remembers, and as a token of that remembrance and of respect, sends us this beautiful flag,

"Oh, long may it wave
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave."

This is the third time a New Hampshire regiment has received a flag from citizens of New York. One from a number of gentlemen, one from a small society of ladies, and this magnificent one from a single lady. Fellow-soldiers, what mean these gifts? I will tell you. It shows that you have made a favorable impression as a regiment, wherever you have been, and now the question comes, shall we maintain the reputation we have? I answer for you, we will try. And now, sir, in behalf of this regiment, I beg through you, to thank Mrs. Veile for this splendid token of her consideration; also I pray convey to her the assurance that with God's blessing we will return with this flag waving triumphantly over us, or die beneath its folds.

The flag cost in New York city $300.00. The fringe is of gold, very heavy, and the staff trimmings of pure silver. Upon one piece is engraven, "Presented to Col. Fellows' regiment, 3d N. H., by Mrs. Veile."

This flag was riddled with bullets in the memorable battle of Deep Run, Aug. 16, 1864. It was followed by a band of as valiant men as ever received their nations' ensign from the hands of fair ladies, and has been safely deposited beside the other war worn, battle stained flags of the regiment in the State House.

On the 18th the Third Regiment went on board Gen. Sherman's flagship Atlantic, and left the harbor on the 19th for Fortress Monroe, arriving there the next day, where they remained until the 29th, when they sailed for Port Royal, and after experiencing a most terrific gale, made that harbor on the 4th of November. After a council of Gen. Sherman and other officers it was determined not to land any troops until the forts on each side of the river should be reduced by the Navy. On the 7th the bombardment commenced in earnest, was grand beyond description and the rebels were completely shelled out. The Third landed on the 9th, went into camp in a cotton and corn field, and in clearing a camp and drill ground burned a large quantity of cotton.

Colonel Fellows issued the following Thanksgiving Proclamation. At the dinner sentiments were offered by representatives from New Hampshire, and responded to with spirit. The occasion was much enjoyed by the regiment and others who participated in the exercises :

HEADQUARTERS 3d N. H. V.,
Hilton Head, S. C., Nov. 28, 1861. }

According to the custom of our fathers I propose to observe this day after New England fashion. For although we are now in South Carolina, we can not forget that we are citizens of New Hampshire.

I sincerely congratulate you, fellow-soldiers, on your good conduct and obedience to orders, and above all on your reputation as a regiment.

Let us therefore, on account of the innumerable blessings by which we have been and are still surrounded, offer up our hearts in thanksgiving and praise to that Being who orders all things well. And may the time soon come when we can bid farewell to war's dread alarms and return to the quiet pursuits of peaceful life.

You will be excused to-day from all unnecessary drill and parade.

E. Q. FELLOWS, COLONEL.

From the 9th of November to the 10th of December, the regiment was engaged in drilling, doing picket and guard duty and furnishing working details on the entrenchments. Dec. 31st, the 47th and 48th New York regiments were ordered to report to Gen. Stevens to take part in an expedition against the enemy's works at Port Royal Ferry, on the Coosaw River. The former regiment having but one field officer, Major Bedel was ordered to accompany the expedition. The object was fully accomplished by the aid of gun boats, after a two days' fight, Jan. 1st and 2d, 1862. The enemy's works were captured and dismantled, one fortification gun secured, and all buildings used as quarters burned. The troops engaged received the thanks of the General commanding the department, in general orders. This was the first real engagement of the land forces in the Department of the South.

January 29th, 1862, Capt. Donohoe, with a platoon of forty men from his company, was ordered to report on board the steamer McClellan, Gen. Sherman's flagship and headquarters, to act as a body guard, and did not return to the regiment until about the first of February. The 48th New York having gone on an expedition under Gen. Veile, the 55th Pennsylvania regiment was assigned to the first brigade. During the month of February all the troops, except the Third New Hampshire and five companies of the 8th Maine regiment, had left Hilton Head for duty elsewhere.

March 18th, Gen. Sherman having left for Fernandina, Fla., Col. Fellows, being in command of the Post, ordered Lieut. Col. Jackson to make a reconnoissance in the direction of Bluffton, with all the available men of the regiment, leaving Major Bedel, much to his displeasure, in command of the camp. The regiment was accompanied by two field pieces and a detachment of the 3d Rhode Island Artillery. About three o'clock on the morning of the 10th they took water transportation and made for White House Point, where companies A and F were ordered to put in and remain quiet until daylight, while the balance of the command was to land at another point further on. This disposition resulted in the capture of four of the enemy's pickets, without firing a gun. The command took boats and proceeded to Bull Island. On the 22d the largest portion of the command proceeded to Bluffton, where a company of rebel cavalry was posted, which evacuated the place at the first fire. The command returned to camp on the 24th.

On the night of the 28th of March the enemy made a demonstration on Edisto Island, surprised the 55th Pennsylvania, posted there, killed two and captured twenty-three of the regiment. Major Bedel, happening to be at Edisto, volunteered to accompany a field piece and ninety men of the 47th New York, to re-enforce Col. White, of the 55th Pennsylvania, then engaged with the enemy, about ten miles from Col. Moore's headquarters. He joined Col. White in season to aid him in forcing the enemy to retire from Edisto and Little Edisto Islands, and reported to Col. Moore before midnight. The 55th Pennsylvania afterward abandoned its post and retired to the vicinity of the 47th New York. Gen. Hunter, who had just relieved Gen. Sherman in the command of the Department, ordered the Third New Hampshire, Col. Fellows, to re-occupy the abandoned post at once. The regiment left Hilton Head on the 3d of April by steamer, and landed on Edisto the same night, and the next day marched across the island to its new quarters. Col. Fellows was ranking officer, in command of the Post, and did not accompany the regiment. Four pieces of the 3d Rhode Island Artillery, Capt. Day, joined the command. Two companies under Major Bedel, with one piece of Capt. Day's battery, were stationed about a mile in front of Regimental Headquarters, toward Jehossie Island; one company, under Capt. Donohoe, was stationed near the south Edisto river; one, under Capt. Dow, was detailed as provost guard at Post Headquarters, and other companies were variously disposed of in similar duties until the 1st of June. Meantime a demonstration was made by Major Bedel, about the 10th of April, on the enemy's pickets at Watt's Cut, but with strict orders not to bring on an engagement. Two or three days afterward a reconnoissance in force was made by Lieut. Col. Jackson at the same point, the rebel pickets driven in and their breastworks leveled. On the 17th a simultaneous advance was made by the Third New Hampshire and Forty-seventh New York, on Jehossie Island, and the enemy driven in. Several other reconnoissances were made on Jehossie and Bonny Hall islands.

On the 23d of April Col. Fellows was relieved by Gen. Wright, and left for home on a sixty days' furlough. He resigned, his resignation was accepted on the 26th of June, and he did not return to the regiment. On the 27th Lieut. Col. Jackson was promoted to Colonel, Major Bedel to Lieut. Colonel, and Capt. Josiah I. Plimpton, of Co. E, to Major.

Soon after Gen. Hunter had relieved Gen. Sherman of the command, the department was divided into two parts, the northern division, in which the Third was serving being under the command of Gen. Benham. The regiment was brigaded with the First Massachusetts Cavalry, Third Rhode Island Artillery, and Sorrell's New York Volunteer Engineers, which was known as the "Division Headquarters Brigade," and was commanded by Col. Robert Williams, of the First Massachusetts Cavalry, he being the ranking officer. On the 4th of May seventeen recruits joined the regiment.

On the 1st of June an order was received for the Third, and Forty-seventh New York to report before daylight the next morning at Post Headquarters, ten miles distant, which done they were ordered to cross the North Edisto river to John's Island, and follow Col. Williams, whom they overtook after a hard march, through rain and mud, of seven miles. On the morning of the 4th the command marched for Legareville, twelve miles, in a tremendous storm and dense darkness, through mud and water half-leg deep. Arrived at their place of destination they found that Gen. Stevens, who went by water, had, with the aid of gunboats, already driven the rebels from some of their batteries and effected a landing on James Island, having taken three guns and disabled another.

On the 6th the command crossed to James Island, and on the 7th was sent to relieve the advanced pickets. During the night it was ordered to make a sudden dash on the rebel pickets and gain any information practicable as to the enemy's strength and position. Major Bedel was field officer of the day in command of the pickets, and was directed to detail one company to go forward to a house occupied by the rebels, and within their picket lines. Capt. Plimpton's Company E, was selected, and at once went forward to the house, the enemy retiring before them. At a concerted signal Companies C, D, and K, moved forward to the support of Company E; but as strong works and many mounted guns could be seen, further advance was not deemed practicable. In the afternoon the experiment was repeated, for the purpose of drawing the enemy's fire. Capt. Donohoe's Company C, moved rapidly forward and passed the house, supported by portions of the regiment and a squad of Cavalry. The enemy opened fire, from his batteries, and as the Third retired he followed so closely that the line was forced back some distance. The ground was, however, retaken, and the regiment was soon after relieved and ordered to join Col. Williams' Brigade, two miles further to the left.

On the 10th a brisk fight took place between the pickets under Col. Guss, of the 79th Pennsylvania, and a regiment of the enemy, which advanced too far in reconnoitering our lines. Major Bedel was present at the picket line when the enemy made his appearance, volunteered to act as aid to Col. Guss, and participated in the fight, and himself captured four prisoners, including a Captain of a Georgia Regiment, with his sword, belt, and pistol, and captured and brought in seven muskets. Col. Williams gave him permission to retain the Captain's arms and one musket. Fifteen of the enemy were killed and found on the field, seven wounded and taken prisoners, two of whom died, and it was reported that sixty-five others were wounded; while the loss on our side was three killed and twelve wounded.

On the 16th of June the Third Regiment received its first baptism in blood. Gen. Benham had ordered an advance on Secessionville, about two miles from camp. Gen. Stevens commenced the attack on the "Marsh Battery" before daylight, and was repulsed three times before the division of Gen. Wright was engaged. A battalion of the Third Rhode Island was sent forward as skirmishers, and the Third New Hampshire was ordered to support it and the Ninety-seventh Pennsylvania, which were said to be in front. On coming within rifle-shot of the rebel batteries no troops were found in front, and the regiment was therefore halted. It proved that the two regiments mentioned had obliqued to the right, and came out in front of Stevens' division. The Third was thrown forward as near the enemy's battery as a marsh and creek intervening would admit, and opened fire, silencing every gun in the battery and driving the enemy out with so hot a fire that not a gun could be loaded or discharged for an hour. In reaching this position the regiment was enfiladed by a field battery with grape and canister. A fort to its left and rear opened with shell and round shot. Musketry from the rear soon followed, and finally shells from Gen. Stevens' battery, and from gunboats in Stono river, intended for the enemy's marsh battery, fell, instead, into the ranks of the Third. Efforts were made to secure re-enforcements to the regiment, or some artillery, to silence the enemy's fire in the rear, but without avail. The Third lay within forty yards of the rebel fort, and would have crossed the stream, had it been fordable, and easily taken the works; but large re-enforcements were brought in from Charleston, by the enemy, and the guns of the men got so foul as in many cases to be useless; and it appearing to be of no advantage to hold the position longer, Lieut. Col. Jackson gave the order to retire, which was accomplished in good order, and soon after the regiment returned to camp. The brigade commander, Col. Williams, in a letter to Gov. Berry, of New Hampshire, said: "I do not believe it possible for men to have acted with more courage, and I desire particularly to call your attention to the marked gallantry of Lieut. Col. Jackson, Major Bedel, and Capt. Plimpton. Their conduct was even noticed by the enemy, as it was afterward stated at a flag of truce." Capt. Plimpton was acting Major at this time.

The regiment went into the fight with twenty-six officers and five hundred and ninety-seven men, of whom one hundred and four were killed and wounded. Capt. Ralph Carlton, a gallant and promising officer, was hit in both legs by a solid shot, and died the same day. Lieut. D. K. Scruton was wounded in the hand and arm, and died of his wounds on the 8th of the following August. Lieut. Walter Cody was severely wounded in the thigh. Lieut. Henry C. Handerson was wounded severely, and Lieuts. R. H. Allen and H. A. Marsh slightly. Lieut. S. M. Smith had his shoulder strap shot off, and Lieut. John R. Haynes had his boot leg ripped open with a musket ball. Col. Jackson mentioned, as particularly deserving notice, besides the field officers, Captains Donohoe, Wilbur and Randlett, Adjutant Libby and Sergeant Major Copp. The regiment went into the battle eagerly and retreated reluctantly. It behaved so well as to command respect, and received the commendation of all. It won a name for valor that will never be forgotten so long as the rebellion is remembered. The failure was solely for want of good generalship. Upon the return of Gen. Hunter, who had been temporarily absent from the Department, Gen. Benham was sent to Washington under arrest.

After spending a fortnight in busy preparation for shelling the enemy out by regular approaches, an order was received to evacuate the island. The regiment, except Co. C, then on picket, embarked July 2d, on steamer Cosmopolitan, and landed at Hilton Head the next day, where it was soon joined by Co. C. Three men deserted from Co. H to the enemy on the 6th of August. On the morning of the 21st the enemy surprised Co. H, on Pinkney Island, killed Lieut. Joseph C. Wiggin, commanding the company, and two privates; wounded three privates, two of whom subsequently died, and captured thirty-six men with their arms. Disease, incident to the climate, prevailed to a great extent and deaths were frequent. Lieut. John H. Thompson, commissary of the regiment, died on the 27th of August, honored and lamented. One hundred and seven recruits joined the regiment from the 13th of September to the 21st of October, about which time Lieut. Col. Jackson, Major Bedel and Capt. Plimpton received commissions promoting them to Colonel, Lieut. Colonel and Major, respectively, dated June 27, 1862. Gen. Hunter was relieved by Gen. O. M. Mitchell.

The regiment under Col. Jackson, accompanied an expedition, under Gen. Brannan, up Broad river, with the design of burning certain bridges on the railroad from Charleston to Savannah, and participated in the battle of Pocotaligo, on the 22d of October, having three men wounded. On this expedition Lieut. Samuel M. Smith, with twelve men of his company and eight oarsmen from a gunboat, landed and captured a rebel Lieutenant and three men, with their arms and equipments, and three horses. The main object of the expedition failed, and the regiment returned to camp at Hilton Head, on the 23d. Yellow fever prevailed to some extent, and on the 30th Gen. Mitchell fell a victim, and was succeeded in command of the Department by Gen. Brannan, until the return of Gen. Hunter, in January, 1863.

On the 16th of February a movement was commenced against Charleston. Six companies of the Third were advanced on Pinkney Island, and intrenched themselves. On the 3d of April, an expedition having been organized, the Third embarked on board steamers. On the 7th the navy, under Commodore Dupont, commenced a bombardment of Fort Sumter and other batteries in Charleston harbor, which continued from three until five o'clock in the afternoon, which was all of any moment that was done against Charleston at this time. The Third, with other troops of the expedition returned to their old camp at Hilton Head, left on the 16th of February.

On the 3d of July, the regiment, with all its baggage, embarked on board the steamer Boston, sailed for Stono Inlet, landed on Folly Island before daylight the next morning, and went into camp. On the evening of the 9th, the rest of the brigade having arrived, the Third and other regiments embarked in small boats, intending to surprise the enemy's batteries and capture their garrison. They rowed quietly up Folly river, and at daybreak next morning came in sight of the enemy's works on Morris Island. Sunrise was the signal for attack both by water batteries and the land force. As the sun appeared our batteries opened with a tremendous crash, taking the enemy entirely by surprise. The shots from their batteries were wild and uncertain; and they were at a loss whether to devote their attention to the monitors on one side, the flotilla of boats on the other, or the batteries in front. A detachment of the Seventh Connecticut was sent on shore to reconnoiter, but were driven back to their boats. The battalion of the Seventh was then landed at another point, supported by four companies of the Forty-eighth New York, and the Third New Hampshire, and the enemy was driven from his rifle pits and his batteries at the lower end of the island, making no stand till he reached Fort Wagner, at the other extreme. Eleven siege guns and mortars, with two hundred prisoners were captured. In this affair the Third behaved with great gallantry. Its loss was nine killed and thirty-one wounded. Lieut. Col. Bedel was struck while in front of the regiment, by a partially spent shell from Fort Wagner, and severely contused in the legs and body, but insisted upon remaining in the field until it was decided that no further advance was to be made that night, when, by order of Assistant Surgeon Kimball, he was carried to Folly Island with the other wounded.

On the morning of the 11th, an attack was ordered on Fort Wagner, in which the Third was part of the reserve; but the movement was not made. From this time until the 15th, the regiment held an advanced position, under a continuous shelling from Wagner, Cummings Point and Sumter. On the 12th one man was killed and two were wounded. On the 15th the Third was relieved. On the 16th Lieut. Colonel Bedel, though not recovered from the wound received on the 10th, returned to duty with the regiment.

THE CHARGE ON FORT WAGNER.

On the 18th of July, 1863, occurred the celebrated charge on Fort Wagner. The Third was at first posted at the headquarters of General Seymour, the division commander. Just at night, when dispositions were made for the assault, it was ordered to form in rear of the Sixth Connecticut, and moved to the flank of one the batteries, where it lay down to escape the fire of the enemy. The Third was on the left of the brigade. In the advance a small creek was encountered, which at that time was flooded by the tide. At this point Col. Jackson ordered Lieut. Col. Bedel to go ahead and see if the ground was practicable. While doing so the enemy opened with artillery and small arms from the fort upon the advancing column with terrible effect, crowded as it was on the narrow neck of sand constituting the only approach. Many of the Fifty-fourth were cut down in an instant, and the organization of the regiment totally annihilated. The Third took cover under some sand knolls, and failed to follow where the Lieut. Colonel had been ordered to go, and when he turned to communicate the fact that the ground was passable it was nowhere to be seen by him. He, discovering a party of the enemy which was outside the fort, hurrying toward an entrance to the right of it, mistook them for a party of his regiment, or at least a portion of the attacking column, sought to join them in the anticipated capture of a gun near the flag-staff which was particularly annoying and fatal to the column; but upon getting near enough to distinguish persons in the dark, found his supposed friends to be enemies, and in attempting to flee from them was driven into the creek, captured and taken into the fort. The regiment was ordered to halt by Col. Jackson, and failed to advance to the fort, and was finally withdrawn under orders from Gen. Strong. The failure was attributable to no soldier in the regiment. Every man would have gallantly followed any commander who would have led him. The loss to the regiment was fifty-five killed, wounded and missing. Among the killed was Adjutant Libby, one of the most gallant officers of the regiment, who was serving as assistant adjutant general on General Strong's staff. Col. Jackson, Captains Ayer and Jackson, and Lieut. Button were wounded.

The army sat down before Fort Wagner, to take it by regular approaches. This required one-third of the command constantly at the front; and while there casualties were of hourly occurrence. At every tour of duty the Third returned with the number of its effective men reduced; yet it so well sustained its reputation that it was one of the three regiments selected by Gen. Gillmore "to be at all hours in front of the army." Col. Jackson was ordered to New Hampshire on the 21st of July, on recruiting service, and did not return to the regiment until the 20th of January, 1864. Major Plimpton was on detached service, Lieut. Col. Bedel was a prisoner of war, and Capt. Randlett, as ranking officer, was in command of the regiment.

On the 6th of September it was determined to try another charge on Fort Wagner, and Gen. Terry selected the Third New Hampshire to lead the "forlorn hope," under command of Capt. Randlett. The following account of the affair was published in the Detroit Tribune from an army correspondent, and is vouched for by Chaplain Hill, as true, so far as it goes:

"A New Hampshire regiment had been engaged in several successive battles, very bloody and very desperate, and in each engagement had been distinguishing themselves more and more; but their success had been very dearly bought both in men and officers. Just before taps, the word came that the fort they had been investing was to be stormed by daybreak the next morning, and they were invited to lead the 'forlorn hope.' For a time the brain of the Colonel fairly reeled with anxiety. The post of honor was the post of danger; but in view of all circumstances, would it be right, by the acceptance of such a proposition, to involve his already decimated regiment in utter annihilation? He called his long and well-tried chaplain into council with him, and asked what was to be done, and the chaplain advised him to let the men decide for themselves.

“At the Colonel’s request he stated to the regiment all the circumstances. Not one in twenty probably would be left alive after the first charge. Scarcely one of the entire number would escape death except as they were wounded or taken prisoners. No one would be compelled to go if he did not go with all his heart. Think it over, men, calmly and deliberately, and come back at twelve o’clock and let us know your answer. True to the appointed time, they all returned. ‘All?’ said I, ‘Yes, sir, all, without exception!’ and all of them ready for service or for sacrifice? ‘Now!’ said the chaplain, ‘go to your tents and write your letters—settle all your worldly business, and whatever sins you have upon your consciences unconfessed and unforgiven, ask God to forgive them. As usual, I will go with you, and the Lord do with us as seemeth Him good.’

“The hour came; the assault was made; on these noble spirits rushed, into ‘the imminent deadly breach,’ right into the jaws of death. But like Daniel when he was thrown into the lion’s den, it pleased God that the lion’s mouth should be shut. Scarcely an hour before, the enemy had secretly evacuated the fort, and the forlorn hope entered into full possession, without the loss of a single man.”

After the occupation of Forts Wagner and Gregg by our forces, the Third was detailed for provost and post duty. From the 25th of November to the 21st of December two hundred and seventy-eight recruits joined the regiment. Col. Jackson resigned on surgeon’s certificate of disability, and his resignation was accepted on the 24th of February, 1864. Between the assault on Fort Wagner, July 18th, 1863, and the 1st of March, 1864, the loss in the regiment was thirty-two killed and wounded. Captains Ayer and Libby, Jr., and Lieutenants Houghton and Edgerly were among the wounded. Between January 1st and March 2d, two hundred and seventy of the men re-enlisted as veterans, and left for home on thirty days' furlough, under Capt. Randlett.

On the 1st of March an order was issued that the regiment should be mounted, under the designation of the "Third New Hampshire Mounted Infantry." On the 7th of the same month horses were furnished, the two flank companies were armed with Spencer repeating carbines, and on the 1st of April left for Jacksonville, Florida, under Major Plimpton. On arrival there four companies, under Capt. Maxwell, were ordered to open communication with our troops at Pilatka, a small town seventy-five miles up the St. Johns river, which they accomplished, and returned to Jacksonville, and found the regiment dismounted. On the 6th of April, Lieut. Col. Bedel—who was still a prisoner of war—was promoted to Colonel, Major Plimpton to Lieut. Colonel, and Capt. Randlett to Major. While at Jacksonville, desertions to the enemy from the recently arrived substitutes became quite frequent, and Lieut. Col. Plimpton secretly posted a line of pickets outside the usual line, and about midnight they seized one of the deserters. The next morning he was tried by a drum-head court martial, and in an hour he was shot. This was the last desertion in that campaign.

The Tenth Corps was assigned to the Army of the James, and the Third was ordered to report to Gen. Terry, at Gloucester Point, where they arrived on the 29th of April, and were met there by the Veteran Volunteers of the regiment, who had just returned from their furlough in New Hampshire. The Third, now recruited to eight hundred men, was brigaded with the Seventh New Hampshire, and Sixth and Seventh Connecticut, under Gen. Joseph R. Hawley, and were assigned to the First Division under Gen. Alfred H. Terry, and the Tenth Corps, commanded by General Gillmore.

From this time they were engaged in the siege of Petersburg, until the 9th of May, when early on that morning the regiment, under Lieut. Col. Plimpton, moved out of camp to participate in a general advance on that place. They moved, under orders from Gen. Terry, on to Brandon Bridge, about two miles from Petersburg, and to the extreme right of the advancing forces. A detachment of cavalry was sent with the regiment to act as couriers to keep up communication. Lieut. Col. Plimpton's instructions were to hold the position, and to allow no troops to cross the bridge; to reconnoiter the position of the enemy, and learn the condition of the bridge, and depth of water in the river. The regiment arrived, about dark within five hundred yards of the bridge, when a halt was ordered, and a line of battle formed. Capt. Ela, with his company, was then detached as skirmishers, and advanced to within about one hundred yards of the bridge, when he met the enemy advancing. A fire was opened almost simultaneously on both sides, grape and canister shot from the opposite shore scattering through the woods for several minutes, when the firing ceased. Night coming on intensely dark, it was not deemed advisable to advance further, and pickets were posted in all directions, and a close watch was kept in expectation of an advance of the enemy. During the night the whistling of locomotives and rumbling of cars could be distinctly heard in Petersburg, bringing troops from the south to the defense of the city.

While reconnoitering the next morning, the enemy opened with grape and canister, firing but a few rounds, however. The position was held until about one o'clock,

P. M., when orders were received from Gen. Gillmore to retire as quickly and quietly as possible. The regiment immediately fell back about two miles, reported to Gen. Terry, and rejoined the division. At this part of the line heavy fighting had been going on during the forenoon. A corps of the rebel army had made an attempt to flank Gen. Butler's line on the right, and Gen. Terry's division, holding this part of the line, had suffered considerable loss. On the arrival of the Third both armies were under a flag of truce, at the request of the enemy, to bury the dead. Late in the afternoon the whole army withdrew from the position, and returned to camp at Bermuda Hundred. The loss of the Third in this move was four wounded.

BATTLE OF DRURY'S BLUFF.

On the 12th of May Gen. Butler commenced an advance toward Richmond with the Tenth and Eighteenth Corps, and arrived at Drury's Bluff on the evening of the 13th. The next morning the corps made a long detour to the left, crossing the railroad and moving on to Chester Court House. An outpost of the enemy captured here, gave information that the rebels were directly in front, strongly intrenched. The Third was selected to lead an advance, and was ordered to move to the left, find the extreme right of the rebel intrenchments, and if possible, make a charge upon their rear. The regiment advanced on the double quick, passing the remainder of the brigade; then making a short turn to the left through the woods, soon found themselves in an open field, with indications of the enemy in front. Passing an abandoned rifle pit, they filed into a belt of woods and halted. Capt. Maxwell was then ordered forward with his company as skirmishers, to feel the way. Advancing down through a ravine he crossed a stream, the bridge over which was destroyed—the men passing over on the one remaining plank, in single file. The regiment was ordered forward, closely following the skirmishers. As it afterward appeared, they were then inside the rebel fortifications. Advancing left in front, the left wing of the regiment had crossed the stream, and filed to the left, preparatory to forming a line of battle, when several shots were fired; then a volley came crashing through the woods, and a line of rebels was seen through the trees advancing down upon them. Too late to re-form, the lieutenant colonel ordered in a loud, ringing voice, “Forward, Third New Hampshire, CHARGE!” The left wing had faced to the right, and charged forward with a well known yell. The right wing moved on as fast as possible over the stream, in great confusion, many of the men throwing themselves into the muddy water waist deep and wading over. The Third New Hampshire charged, and though all organization was lost, and the dead and the wounded were falling on every side, they moved on up the slope unflinchingly. Volley after volley was poured in on either side, till it was one continued roll of musketry. The rebel line was broken and gave way, forced back into and outside their own works. Just at this juncture the First Brigade of Gen. Terry’s division charged the enemy in front, and the victory was complete—forcing the enemy from their line of works on to Fort Darling—thus securing to our forces the whole of the first line of the outer defenses of Richmond. For this victory the Third New Hampshire paid dearly, and when it was proved by subsequent events to be a useless victory, it was indeed found a bloody and terrible sacrifice. The fighting lasted but twenty minutes; but in those twenty minutes more than two hundred of New Hampshire’s bravest and best fell dead or wounded. Among the foremost fell the gallant Capt. Richard Ela, while in advance of his men, leading them in the charge. He was shot through the brain, and expired almost instantly. Among the wounded were Major Randlett, Adjutant E. J. Copp, and Lieut. Hazen.

The enemy kept up a continual and harassing fire, and during the 15th and 16th about twenty-five men were killed or wounded. Early on the morning of the 16th the army was advanced to the extreme front, and the Third, with the rest, were ordered to prepare for a charge upon the enemy's lines. Soon heavy firing commenced on the right. The enemy, in a dense fog, had made a flank movement to the left, and attacked the Eighteenth Corps in the rear. The Third, with a part of the Tenth Corps, were ordered to the assistance of the Eighteenth, when the firing extended along the line, and the attack became general. Instead of a charge, a retreat was ordered, and the whole line commenced falling back. As this movement commenced the enemy came in on the left and rear. Gen. Terry rode up and called for the Third New Hampshire, and said to Lieut. Col. Plimpton—"I want the Third New Hampshire to charge the enemy advancing on the left." The charge was made and the enemy were routed and forced back to their intrenchments. The retreat was continued, and at night the Army of the James were in their intrenchments at Bermuda Hundred. The Third suffered considerable loss in the retreat. Capt. Ayer, a brave and valuable officer, was mortally wounded on the morning of the 16th, when Lieut. Button took command of the company, and soon received a death wound.

The Union army fell back several miles, and built a line of works extending across the peninsula from the Appomattox to the James. The Third Regiment was encamped in the rear of a battery, where it was constantly exposed to fire from the rebel artillery, and lived mainly in bomb-proof.

On the 2d of June the rebels charged a portion of the line held by the Seventh Connecticut, and drove them back on their reserves. The Third New Hampshire was ordered to retake the lost ground, which was speedily accomplished by a gallant charge of four companies, commanded by Capt. Maxwell. They captured one hundred and fifty prisoners, and lost eight men killed and wounded.

On the 15th Gen. Grant's army crossed the James river, and, joining Gen. Butler's left, advanced on Petersburg. To meet this advance, Beauregard withdrew from Butler's front, and on the 16th a reconnoissance was made by the latter's whole force. Having nearly reached the Petersburg and Richmond turnpike, they met Picket's Division of Lee's army, hastening to the assistance of Beauregard, and backed by the whole army of Northern Virginia. Capt. Maxwell, with two companies deployed as skirmishers, advanced toward the turnpike. Having repulsed three advances of the enemy, our forces were ordered to retire, and finally reached their old line. During the fight the Third lost about forty in killed and wounded. Lieut. Tredick was mortally wounded, and died on the 6th of July. Captains Maxwell and Libby, and Lieut. McCoy were severally wounded. From the 13th of May to the 19th of June inclusive, out of eight hundred and eighty-one, which left Gloucester Point, the regiment lost in killed, wounded and missing, two hundred and eighty-nine men.

In July the regiment exchanged their Enfield for Spencer rifles, a very effective breach-loader and seven-shooter. Thus armed the troops were almost invincible. On the 13th of August the Tenth Corps moved across the James river, to co-operate with the Second Corps in an advance on Richmond. It marched to Deep Bottom, thence through works occupied by our troops under Gen. Foster, to the extreme front, where a line of battle was formed, the Third on the left of the brigade. The pickets of the enemy were forced back, and the brigade advanced to an open field, fronting a line of rebel earthworks, and here formed double column in mass, to support a light battery, the Third having position on the right of the Seventh Connecticut. This position was held, under fire, from early on the morning of the 14th until four o'clock in the afternoon, when the brigade moved to the right about one hundred yards, and formed a line of battle. Lieut. Col. Plimpton was ordered by Gen. Terry to hold the Third Regiment in readiness to charge upon an advancing line of the enemy. This position was held until ten o'clock in the evening, when the army commenced a flank movement to the right, in the direction of Malvern Hill, and bivouaced for the night near New Market road from Deep Bottom. The next day, the 15th, an attack was made upon the enemy's lines, the Third, with its brigade being held in reserve, where it was for three hours exposed to the fire of shot, shell and canister from the rebel batteries posted in a belt of woods.

Early on the morning of the 16th the right wing of the regiment was advanced as skirmishers through an open field to the edge of a swamp, across which the enemy were strongly intrenched. Sharp skirmishing ensued, but with no decisive results, till about noon, when it was determined to storm the enemy's position. At the order, the Third with its brigade, charged on the line of the rebel works, which they carried, taking a large number of prisoners. From here another charge was made through an open field, and under a terrific fire from the enemy. This charge was repulsed, when three counter-charges were made by the rebels in the attempt to retake the first line, which were repulsed by the Union troops. The Third was afterward ordered to retire. The loss of the regiment in this engagement was very severe. Ten officers and eighty-three men were killed, wounded or missing. Lieut. Col. Plimpton was shot through the heart while leading the last charge. Lieut. S. N. Lamprey was mortally wounded and died in a few hours. Lieut. C. A. White was wounded and left on the field, but afterward returned to join in the fight, and had hardly reached the regiment when a bullet struck his arm, passed through his lungs and out at the left side—a distance of fifteen inches—notwithstanding which he eventually recovered. Capt. Wadlia and Adjutant Copp were severely wounded. Lieutenants Eldridge, Ackerman, Donley, Giddings and Atherton were more or less severely wounded. Lieut. Atherton was shot through the lungs, left on the field and reported killed, but was taken prisoner of war, soon after paroled, exchanged and rejoined his regiment. The behavior of the regiment in this engagement was highly commended on all hands, and its record never stood better than at the close of this bloody battle. Seven days more, and the term of enlistment of many of the men would have expired, yet they went in as cheerfully and fought as bravely as though they had a reputation to make for themselves which would follow them through a long campaign. Entering the fight with less than two hundred men, it captured and took to the rear about three hundred prisoners, and sustained a loss of nearly one-half its entire strength.

On the 20th of August the regiment returned to Bermuda Hundred. The term of service of such of the original members as had not re-enlisted expired on the 23d, and they were promptly mustered out and started on their way home, under command of Capt. R. W. Houghton, and accompanied by Chaplain Hill, both well beloved and honored officers, bearing with them, tattered, torn and pierced by many rebel balls, the beloved colors presented them by the ladies of Hampstead, without a stain of dishonor upon it.

On the 24th of August the Tenth Corps crossed the Appomattox, and went on duty in the trenches in front of Petersburg. The duty was severe and casualties of daily occurrence. It remained here until the 28th of September, when it crossed the James river, and the next day the Third participated in the advance on Laurel Hill and Chapin's Farm; and the same afternoon took part in the reconnoissance to within two miles of Richmond, and in a similar movement on the 1st of October. Major Randlett, who had been absent on leave and on detached service, since he was wounded, joined the regiment the last of September.

On the 7th of October the enemy made a vigorous attack on our lines, which the Third successfully repelled until their ammunition was exhausted, captured thirty prisoners and lost twenty-five killed and wounded. On the 13th, at Darbytown Road, a charge was ordered to be made by another brigade, and the Third was sent to support it. The brigade broke and fled, leaving the regiment alone, where it retained its position until ordered to leave the field, and was withdrawn in good order, not a man falling from the ranks. On the 28th and 29th another attempt was made to dislodge the enemy from Darbytown and Charles City Roads, in which the Third participated, losing seventeen killed and wounded. Captain Trickey and Lieut. McCoy were among the wounded.

On the 2d of November the Third, with other regiments, embarked on steamers for New York City to preserve order at the Presidential election there. When the election was over they returned to Bermuda Hundred, having been absent from the army seventeen days. On this expedition the men suffered severely from cold and hunger—the only food received being short rations of pork and hard bread. Major Randlett was promoted to Lieut. Colonel on the 12th of October, and Capt. Trickey to Major on the 4th of January, 1865.

On the 15th of January, 1865, the Third Regiment participated in the successful night assault upon Fort Fisher. The garrison flag was hauled down by Capt. Edgerly, of the Third, and given to Gen. Terry, and by him to the Secretary of War. Shortly afterward a movement was made upon a rebel force three miles to the rear of Fort Fisher, in which the Third made a charge and captured about sixty prisoners. In these two battles the regiment lost four killed and ten wounded. Major Trickey commanded the regiment from the 20th of December, 1864, to the 17th of February, 1865, Lieut. Col. Randlett having been left at Laurel Hill with a portion of the regiment, but joined the main body at the latter date.

On the 19th of February a movement was commenced on Wilmington. On the 22d, with the Third deployed as skirmishers, the army entered Wilmington, which had been abandoned by the enemy, and, having passed through the city, the Third kept up a running fight; drove the enemy across Smith's Creek; saved the bridge which the rebels had fired, and captured a pontoon bridge at North East Ferry, ten miles from Wilmington. Lieut. Col. Randlett was appointed provost marshal of Wilmington, and nearly half of the regiment was detailed as provost guard. The remainder were commanded by Major Trickey, until the return of Col. Bedel, April 11th, after his seventeen months of severe imprisonment. He was received by the men with many demonstrations of joy and respect.

While at Wilmington Surgeon A. J. H. Buzzell died of disease, March 28th 1865. A writer said of him—
“A nobler man never lived; a christian and a patriot, devoted thoroughly to his duties, and ambitious to serve the best interests of the cause. In his death the country lost a true man and soldier, the regiment a noble benefactor. God bless his memory, will be the prayer of every soldier of the Third New Hampshire."

In May a new stand of national colors was received from the State, on which was inscribed the names of the battles in which the regiment had been engaged. This was prized as an evidence of the gallantry, valor, and hard service of the regiment; but the love of the old flags, which had been proudly borne in the numerous battle fields, was still as strong as ever in the heart of every soldier who had followed and fought under their tattered and riddled folds.

On the 3d of June Col. Bedel was ordered to proceed with the regiment, and occupy the post of Goldsborough, North Carolina. On the 10th and 11th the Sixth and Seventh Connecticut, and the Seventh New Hampshire Regiments arrived at the Post and reported to Col. Bedel, and he remained in command of the Post till the return of Brevet Brig. Gen. Abbott from New Hampshire, on the 5th of July.

On the 20th of July, 1865, the regiment was mustered out of the service of the United States, and ordered to New Hampshire for final discharge and payment. It arrived at Concord on the 28th, with twenty-six officers and three hundred and twenty-four men. Gov. Frederick Smyth, Adjutant General Natt Head, Col. Peter Sanborn, State Treasurer, and Gen. M. T. Donohoe, addressed the regiment in thrilling speeches, congratulating the survivors on their safe return, and paying a just tribute to the memory of the many gallant officers and men who had sacrificed their lives in their country's cause. Col. Bedel—appointed Brig. Gen. U. S. Volunteers by brevet, July 22d, "for gallant and meritorious service, to rank as such from March 13, 1865"—and Lieut. Col. Randlett responded for the regiment. The flags were then returned to the Governor, and the regiment, after having partaken of a bountiful repast, generously supplied, marched to the camp ground south of the city, where the enlisted men were discharged and paid off on the 2d of August, and the officers on the 3d and 4th, and the Third New Hampshire Regiment of Volunteers, equally distinguished for its orderly and soldierly conduct in its final discharged, as for gallantry and valor in its many hard fought battles, ceased to exist except in the pages of history.

During the four years' service on the Atlantic coast in the States of South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Virginia and North Carolina, the Third Regiment was engaged in the following sieges, battles, reconnoissances, skirmishes, &c. :

During its term of service the regiment had on its rolls 1717 enlisted men, including 44 non-commissioned staff and band, and 101 officers, making an aggregate of 1818. Of these 190 were killed in battle or died of wounds; 137 died of disease; 196—nearly all substitutes—deserted; 740 discharged—300 by expiration of term and 440 by reason of disability, &c.; 52 transferred; 6 rejected; 2 dismissed; 3 shot for desertion; 6 missing in action, and not known whether killed, prisoners, or deserters. Two hundred and seventy of the regiment re-enlisted in January and February, 1864, and are taken into account but once in the aggregate of 1818. The casualties in wounded and prisoners were 487 wounded and 91 prisoners. Nearly all the prisoners taken subsequent to the surprise and capture of Company H, on Pinkney Island, August 21, 1862, languished and died of starvation in southern prisons.

An officer of the regiment wrote—"To the excellent corps of Surgeons and Assistant Surgeons attached to the regiment, from its organization to its disbandment, may be attributed the small number of deaths in the regiment. Their moral and temperate habits, their integrity as gentlemen, their skill as Surgeons, and faithful and prompt attention to duty, rendered them conspicuous. This was particularly the case with Surgeons Buzzell and Kimball, than whom no better Surgeons belonged to the army."

The roll of honor comprises officers killed in battle and died of wounds, as follows: Lieut. Col. PLIMPTON; Captains CARLTON, ELA and AYER; Adjutant LIBBY; First Lieutenants BUTTON and LAMPREY; Second Lieutenants SCRUTON, WIGGIN, ROBINSON, TREDICK and MORRILL. Died of disease—Surgeon BUZZELL, First Lieutenant THOMPSON, and Second Lieutenant BRYANT.

Wounded June 6, 1864. Killed at Deep Run, Va., Aug. 16, 1864.

All the Field and several of the Company officers in the Fourth were officers in the First Regiment, and had knowledge of the duties required of them. Col. Whipple was Lieut. Colonel of the First, and also held a commission in the Mexican war. Lieut. Colonel Bell, Major Drew, Quartermaster Kelley, Capt. Greenleaf, and Capt. Sleeper were Captains in the First Regiment, and many of the other officers and soldiers had served three months in that regiment.

COL. THOMAS J. WHIPPLE.

Col. Whipple was born at Wentworth on the 30th of January, 1816, and is a son of Dr. Thomas Whipple, of that town. He graduated at the military University at Norwich, Vermont, under the instruction of Col. Ransom, who was killed in the Mexican War. He read law with Hon. Josiah Quincy, of Rumney, and after being admitted to the bar commenced practice at Meredith, now Laconia. In April, 1847, he was appointed First Lieutenant in the Ninth United States Infantry, and Adjutant of the same regiment in May following. He went with his regiment to Vera Cruz, and while on a visit to a Catholic cemetery in the neighborhood of the city, in company with private R. H. A. Barnes, of his regiment, was taken prisoner. When Lieut. Whipple and his companion came to the gate of the cemetery they were confronted by three Mexicans, who had dismounted from their horses, with their guns pointed at them. Lieut. Whipple was armed with a sword, and placed himself at once against the wall, and prepared for a defense. Barnes, who was unarmed, made the best of his way through the cemetery to the camp. The Mexicans made at Whipple, who stoutly defended himself. One of them hit him a blow upon the head, which stunned but did not injure him, as the blow, meeting a parry, struck flatwise upon Whipple's head. Recovering himself he went at his antagonists again, when they retreated a few paces and brought their guns to bear upon him, indicating by signs, which Lieut. Whipple well understood, that if he did not surrender they would fire. He finally surrendered, and was taken away upon a mustang, while his own horse was appropriated by one of his captors. Barnes on reaching camp gave the alarm, and a detachment was sent out in search of Whipple, but the guerillas had escaped with their captive. He was a prisoner several months and was kindly treated. He was subsequently exchanged, joined his regiment, and distinguished himself at Atliteco, where he was volunteer Aid-de-camp to Brig. Gen. Lane. Adjutant Whipple resigned in February, 1848. and resumed the practice of law at Laconia.

Col. Whipple was assistant clerk of the New Hampshire House of Representatives in 1848, and clerk in 1849, '50, '51, and 52. In 1849 he was appointed Solicitor for Belknap County, which office he held four years. When the war of the rebellion broke out, in April 1861, Col. Whipple was appointed Lieut. Colonel of the First Regiment, and his military knowledge, acquired both at Norwich, Vt., and in the Mexican war, was of great service in organizing and disciplining the regiment. He was mustered out with his regiment, at the end of its term of enlistment, August 9, 1861. On the 20th of the same month he was appointed Colonel of the Fourth Regiment, and resigned in March, 1862. His courage and patriotism as an officer were never called in question. He is now engaged in an extensive law practice at Laconia, and in the cultivation of a fine farm. He is a gentleman of marked ability as an advocate, is eminently social and genial, and has many warm friends.

GEN. LOUIS BELL.

Louis Bell was the youngest son of the late Gov. Samuel Bell, and was born in Chester, March 8th, 1837. Among his older brothers were Dr. Luther V. Bell, long at the head of the McLean Asylum for the Insane, at Somerville, Mass., Hon. James Bell, a distinguished lawyer and United States Senator, and Hon. Samuel D. Bell, Chief Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court.

After completing his preparatory studies at Derry and at Gilford, he entered Brown University, at Providence, R. I., where he graduated at the age of eighteen years. His taste and aptitude for athletic and martial exercises had made him desirous of an appointment to the Military Academy at West Point, and, at a later period, of a commission in the army; but circumstances prevented the accomplishment of either of these wishes. The same inclination, however, led him to direct his reading and study largely to military subjects, a circumstance which was of great advantage to him in his subsequent career.

He then prepared himself for the legal profession, and was admitted to the bar in 1857, establishing himself in Farmington. His ability and high personal character at once secured him friends and clients. In 1859 he received the appointment of Justice of the Police Court of Farmington, and two years later, that of Solicitor of the County of Strafford.

The breaking out of the rebellion found Mr. Bell married, and fairly established in business, with the most flattering professional prospects for the future. But President Lincoln's call for volunteers in April, 1861, was an appeal to his patriotism and military spirit which was irresistible. He immediately offered his services to Gov. Goodwin, and was appointed Captain of Company A in the First Regiment of New Hampshire Volunteers. The organization was rapidly completed, and the regiment leaving Concord May 25, 1861, proceeded directly to Washington. During their three months' term of service they were stationed on the line of the Potomac, above Washington, and engaged chiefly in picket duty, a service sufficiently responsible and trying, but affording few incidents worthy of special mention. Capt. Bell discharged his duties faithfully and creditably, and returned with the regiment to New Hampshire, thoroughly acquainted with the practical part of a soldier's life, and having gained the respect and esteem of officers and men.

The Fourth New Hampshire Regiment was then about being formed, and Capt. Bell was immediately commissioned as its Lieutenant Colonel. On the 27th of September, 1861, that regiment left the State, and constituted a part of the expedition against Port Royal and Beaufort, S. C. At the latter post Gen. T. W. Sherman was in command. He was struck with the efficiency and soldierly qualities of Lieut. Col. Bell, and made him his Inspector General and chief of staff. This place he continued to hold, to the General's entire satisfaction, during the whole period of Sherman's stay in the department.

In the discharge of this duty, he was in December sent by Gen. Sherman, in a light steamer, to make a reconnoissance around Port Royal Island. He succeeded in unearthing a concealed rebel battery, which opened fire upon the steamer, with the effect of slightly wounding Col. Bell and one of his men.

Upon the resignation of Col. Whipple, Col. Bell succeeded in March, 1862, to the command of the Fourth Regiment. In April he was ordered with seven companies to occupy the fortified town of St. Augustine, Florida. His administration of affairs there was extremely judicious and efficient. The position being much exposed, its works were put into a thoroughly defensible condition; the troops were admirably organized and trained, and the civil government of the town was conducted in a manner completely satisfactory.

In October, 1862, Col. Bell again united his command at Beaufort, to join the expedition designed to cut the railroad between Charleston and Savannah, at the Pocolaligo river. Although the Fourth Regiment had in detachments seen some skirmishing, this was their first appearance as an organization in any serious engagement, but they acquitted themselves with much credit, and acted as rear-guard on the retreat. Their loss was about thirty men, killed and wounded. Col. Bell, who led his men gallantly, was here again slightly wounded by a splinter from a shell.

In the Spring of 1863 began the series of operations against Charleston and its defenses. The Fourth Regiment was employed the greater part of the summer on engineer duty, in working among the hot sands of Folly and Morris Islands. Here Col. Bell had an opportunity to put in practice some of the knowledge which he had acquired years before, while intending to enter the military profession. He experimented, with a good degree of success, in the preparation of a new shell-fuse, designed to obviate some of the difficulties experienced in mortar practice, and of a "Greek fire," to be conveyed in shells for the purpose of producing conflagrations.

In April, 1864, Col. Bell was ordered with his regiment, to report to Gen. Butler, to join the Army of the James. He was placed in command of a brigade, consisting of the Fourth New Hampshire, Thirteenth Indiana, Ninth Maine, One Hundred Seventeenth New York, and Ninety-seventh Pennsylvania Regiments, with which he took part in the affair at Swift Creek, in the severe engagement at Drury's Bluff, and in the series of struggles on the 17th, 20th and 21st of May. He also held the left of the line in the battle at Cold Harbor, and, after the subsequent flank movement, led his brigade to the assault of two of the forts before Petersburg, which he carried in handsome style, being himself among the first to enter the works.

He was also engaged with his command in the unfortunate "Mine" assault, and conducted himself so well that he was one of the few general officers concerned who escaped without censure, in the report of the Board that investigated the affair.

Of both the expeditions against Fort Fisher, Col. Bell's brigade formed a part. When Gen. Terry was selected to undertake the second, it was clear to every mind that there was to be no failure, whatever the cost of success.

In the final assault upon the works, now strengthened in every possible way, and defended with desperation, Col. Bell's brigade formed the third line of attack. At the signal for their advance, they pushed forward in admirable order, their leader, as was his custom, at their head, into the storm of fire. The Colonel had just congratulated a brother officer on the splendid behavior of the men, as they reached the ditch in front of the work, and a bullet from the rifle of a sharpshooter, on the crest of the parapet above them, struck him in the left breast and passed downward through his body. He fell, mortally wounded, and was tenderly borne by his comrades to the rear. But he would not leave the field till he could see the colors of his regiment upon the fort, and it was but a moment before his dying wish was gratified, and the tattered ensign of the Fourth was planted upon the ramparts of the captured stronghold.

With the going down of the sun his life ebbed away, and the morning saw the spirit of the loyal, chivalrous and accomplished soldier winging its flight from earth.

On the day after the costly purchase of the national triumph, the Secretary of War arrived at Fort Fisher. By command of President Lincoln, he conferred upon Col. Bell the brevet rank of Brigadier General, dating from January 15th, the day when he received his fatal wound.

Such is a brief sketch of the career of one of the noblest men who laid his life upon the altar of his country. Strictly conscientious in the performance of duty, thoroughly skilled in every detail of his position, tenderly solicitous for the safety and comfort of his men, and sharing every hardship and danger with them, honorable, patriotic and eminent for prudence, coolness and courage, he was universally beloved and respected.

The Fourth Regiment left Manchester for Washington, D. C., on the 27th of September, receiving the customary hospitalities and attentions on the way, and arrived there on the 30th. They went into camp on the Bladensburg road, about a mile and a half from the city, immediately after which they were armed with Belgium rifles, and were at once put to drilling. The regiment remained here until the 9th of October, when they started to join Gen. Sherman's Expeditionary Corps, at Annapolis, Md., where they arrived the same day. The regiment was brigaded with the Sixth and Seventh Connecticut, and Ninth Maine, under command of Brig. Gen. H. G. Wright, who was subsequently the popular commander of the Sixth Army Corps.

On the 19th the regiment embarked on board the steamer Baltic, and in company with the rest of the expedition, sailed for Fortress Monroe, where it remained until the 29th, awaiting the preparation of the Navy, when the whole land and naval forces sailed under orders, the import of which was known only to the commander of the expedition. The Baltic had in tow the ship Ocean Express, loaded with ammunition and ordnance. On the 30th the wind became strong and the sea rough, which threatened danger to the less staunch vessels of the fleet. About two o'clock the next morning the Baltic struck on Frying Pan Shoals with a tremendous crash. For a time there was imminent danger of a complete shipwreck, and the wildest excitement prevailed on board the Baltic. The steamer was finally relieved from her perilous condition, when a terrible gale ensued, which continued three days. On arrival at Port Royal, on the 4th of November, where the rest of the fleet had assembled, it was ascertained that the vessels Commodore Perry and Governor had been lost, though every person on board had been almost miraculously saved. The Baltic was ordered to put to sea, and cruise about to find the Ocean Express, which was cut loose from the Baltic when she struck upon Frying Pan Shoals. She returned the next day, after an unsuccessful search. During the storm the steamer Union had been driven ashore, and Quartermaster Sergeant Kelley, of the Fourth, with a squad of men, and the crew of the steamer, were made prisoners.

On the morning of the 7th of November the gunboats commenced an attack on the rebel works at Hilton Head, and the Wabash, Pawnee and Sabine opened their terrible broadsides on the enemy's batteries. For five hours about one shell per second fell upon each of the forts. Fifteen thousand men clustered in the rigging and around the masts of the transports, to witness the grand spectacle. The fleet gradually neared the shore, and the rebel gunners replied but feebly and at intervals. At two o'clock no response was received from the forts. The rebels left their intrenchments, and an hour later the stars and stripes superseded the rebel flag on the parapet, while the troops and sailors rent the air with their cheers. After nineteen days of confinement on shipboard, the Fourth went ashore at Hilton Head. The victory of the Navy was complete and glorious, with but very small loss. Nineteen cannon were captured and an important post had been taken.

The Fourth passed three months at Hilton Head, at work on fortifications, erecting wharves and landing stores, drilling only at intervals. At inspection one day Col. Whipple rebuked a soldier for having a dirty gun. "I know my gun is dirty," replied the man, "but I've got the brightest shovel you ever saw, Colonel." The soldier's wit saved him from punishment. The arduous duties performed, together with the change of climate, told upon the health of the men, and funerals were of daily occurrence.

Early in January, 1862, the Chaplain, M. W. Willis, was discharged on account of ill health. On the 21st, the Fourth, with other regiments, sailed from Hilton Head on an expedition down the coast. They came to an anchorage at Warsaw Sound, Georgia, and the troops were landed on Warsaw Island, a marshy, unhealthy spot, and remained on shore and on board, awaiting the arrival of the navy, until the 28th of February, when the expedition started again, and the next day arrived within twelve miles of Fernandina, Florida. On the 2d of March it was ascertained that the rebels had evacuated the place, and Fernandina and Brunswick were occupied by our troops, the Fourth being encamped in the town.

On the 8th of March the regiment, except Companies E and F, which were left at Fernandina, under command of Capt. Towle, as a provost guard, embarked on the steamer Boston, and in company with six gunboats proceeded down the coast and anchored for the night. The next morning the soldiers were distributed among the gunboats as sharpshooters. One boat crossed the bar and found that the batteries commanding the entrance to the river, which, with those further up, were very strong, had been evacuated—the enemy leaving their guns and every thing in perfect order, without having fired a shot. The fleet proceeded up the St. Johns River, and found that the rebels were burning lumber and saw mills along its banks, most of which belonged to northern men. They had also burned two gunboats which were being built at Jacksonville. On the 12th, the regiment, except Company C, which was left at Mayport, and Company I, which went down the river with the Hurn, reached Jacksonville, where the inhabitants generally received them with gladness. Some of the inhabitants had left however, and large quantities of furniture and personal baggage were left in their hurry, piled up ready for transportation.

On the 13th an advanced picket line was established, which was fired on the next day by scouts in the woods, and apprehending an attack, the supports fell back under cover of the gunboats, and barricaded the streets. No attack was made, however. On the 15th Company G, having found a quantity of rum in the town, imbibed it very freely, got drunk, and mutinied. Companies H and K charged bayonets on them, disarmed and ironed the leaders, and in the melee one member of Company G was killed. On the 17th a reconnoissance was made by Company H, five miles into the country, but a deserted camp of the enemy was all that was found. About this time, Colonel Whipple having resigned, his resignation was accepted, and he left the regiment to the regret of almost every officer and man. He was an excellent disciplinarian and an accomplished soldier. Lieut. Colonel Bell was promoted to Colonel, and Capt. Gilman E. Sleeper, of Company C, was promoted to Lieut. Colonel. While at Jacksonville the Fourth performed much arduous duty. A skirmish occurred on picket in which the regiment lost two men killed, three wounded, and four taken prisoners.

On the 8th of April General Hunter ordered the place evacuated, and Col. Bell with seven companies, was sent to garrison St. Augustine, on the coast. Companies B, H and K, under command of Major Drew, embarked on the 8th of June for James Island, South Carolina, and were temporarily assigned to the brigade commanded by Colonel Welch, of the Forty-fifth Pennsylvania, and took part in several skirmishes and the engagement at James Island, under Gen. Benham, but met with no loss. On the 12th of the same month these three companies were ordered to Beaufort, South Carolina, and constituted a part of the garrison of the town during the summer. The seven companies stationed at St. Augustine passed the summer there without casualties or incidents worthy of note. Fort Marion was put in good repair and the city in a state of defense. In September they were relieved by the Seventh New Hampshire, and joined the detachment at Beaufort. General Mitchell assumed command of the Department, and preparations were made for active movements. The Fourth was brigaded with the Third New Hampshire, the Sixth Connecticut, Forty-seventh New York, and Henry's Battery, commanded by Brig. Gen. Brannan. The Fourth participated in the battle of Pocotaligo, an account of which is given in the history of the movements of the Third Regiment. The plan was to capture the pickets and surprise the garrison, while a detachment in a light draught boat were to proceed up the river and burn the bridge. This plan was frustrated by a delay on the part of the gunboats, which gave the rebels time to obtain re-enforcements. The troops landed and marched four miles, when the Forty-seventh New York engaged the enemy. Henry's Battery was thrown forward, supported by the Fourth New Hampshire, which came under a heavy artillery fire in a small cotton field, through which ran the road to the bridge. The regiment formed line of battle and advanced to a marsh two hundred yards wide, on the opposite side of which was a rebel battery which hastily retreated. A sharp running skirmish of two miles ensued, in which a caisson and several prisoners were captured. The line was met by a raking fire from the defenses of the bridge, four hundred yards distant, across an impassable marsh, and only accessible by a narrow road. Trains loaded with re-enforcements were distinctly seen, showing that further advance with the small force was impracticable. A heavy fire of musketry and artillery was opened upon both sides which lasted until night, when the Union troops were quietly withdrawn—the Fourth taking the rear of the retreat. In this engagement the regiment lost three men killed and twenty-five wounded. Colonel Bell was struck by the splinter of a shell. Capt. Wallace and Lieut. Mayne were both severely wounded by the same ball. Not a man flinched from his duty. For a time Col. Bell was disabled by his wound, and the regiment was commanded by Lieut. Col. Sleeper. Before night, however, Col. Bell returned and resumed command. The expedition failed and the regiment returned and went into winter-quarters at Beaufort, South Carolina, where they remained for five months doing picket duty and drilling. Thanksgiving and Christmas were observed in true New England fashion.

During the year that had elapsed since the Fourth left the State, many changes had taken place in its organization. One colonel, two captains, three first lieutenants and two second lieutenants had resigned; eleven officers had been promoted, and eight men had been promoted to officers from the ranks. One captain had been dismissed; Capt. Currier and Lieut. Drew, and twenty-four men had died of disease; three had been drowned, one killed by the enemy, and two by accident.

The spring of 1863 opened with a great expedition against Charleston. On the 4th of April the Fourth Regiment received marching orders, embarked on transports and proceeded to Hilton Head, where it was brigaded with the Third and five companies of the Seventh New Hampshire, and Sixth Connecticut. The brigade was commanded by Col. H. S. Putnam, of the Seventh, and the division by Gen. A. H. Terry. The troops sailed from Hilton Head to Stono Inlet, and remained on board awaiting the result of the bombardment of Fort Sumter by the navy. The navy not having succeeded in taking the fort, the troops were carried back to Hilton Head on the 11th of April. The brigade organization was disbanded and the regiment went into camp.

On the 17th of April a new brigade was organized, consisting of the Third and Fourth New Hampshire, the Sixth Connecticut, and a battalion of Sharpshooters, all under the command of Col. Louis Bell, of the Fourth, and assigned to Gen. Terry's division. On the 18th another expedition against Charleston was inaugurated, under Gen. Gillmore, who was in command of the Department. The troops on transports arrived at North Edisto River on the 19th, and had another time on shipboard, awaiting the arrival of the navy. On the 28th it was decided to abandon the expedition, and the whole force, both land and naval, sailed for Stono River, and the brigade was again broken up. The next day the Fourth arrived at Stono Inlet, disembarked on Folly Island and reported to Gen. Vogdes, commanding the United States forces on the island. The regiment encamped within two miles of the enemy's works on Morris Island, in a thick growth of pines, from whose tops Charleston harbor, with the surrounding forts could be plainly seen. During several weeks the time was occupied in building fortifications and picketing the northern extremity of the island, about fifty yards from the rebel pickets, across a little inlet on Morris Island. The pickets agreed not to fire on each other, and had very agreeable intercourse, exchanged tobacco, coffee, and newspapers, sent across the inlet in small boats. The ladies occasionally came down from Charleston to take a look at the Yanks, and so the time passed, until the first of June, when the rebels, to save the cargo of a blockade runner, which had been grounded off Light House Inlet, midway between the two islands, opened a heavy fire upon the Union pickets, who built breast-works of such light materials as were at hand, and screened from the view of the rebels by the thick bushes that lined the shore, and a dense thicket in the background, constructed masked batteries, unbeknown to the enemy, who supposed the sand works they could see were only protections to the pickets, and neglected to strengthen their fortifications, which might have been made impregnable to any direct assault. Thus the attempt to save the cargo of the blockade runner led to the capture of the island.

On the night of the 17th of June, Company B, of the Fourth Regiment, commenced the first works in the last long siege of Charleston. One man was killed by a piece of shell. For twenty-one nights, and nearly as many days, the regiment constructed masked batteries, working in silence, no one being allowed to speak above a whisper. On the morning of the 8th of July the work was completed. Forty-four guns and mortars were in position, the magazine filled, and the embrasures cleared. Severe labor and want of sleep had so exhausted the men that they were obliged to relinquish the completion of the work they had so faithfully commenced, to fresh troops, drilled for the purpose. The Fourth joined Gen. Terry's command, and participated in a diversion upon James Island. On the morning of the 10th the batteries opened simultaneously upon the enemy, who were taken completely by surprise. A rebel officer, while surveying our pickets through a glass, suddenly exclaimed "By —, the Yanks have mounted a gun over there." At that moment forty-four "peacemakers" rained iron upon him. The advance was halted by the guns of Fort Wagner, and after two desperate and bloody charges it was determined to take that formidable work by regular approaches. On the same day the Fourth Regiment returned from James Island, and a lodgment having been effected by our forces on Morris Island, the Fourth was selected, for its coolness in working under fire, to report to Major Brooks, of Gen. Gillmore's staff, and in charge of siege works, for engineer duty.

The approaches, consisting of five parallels, connected by "covered ways" or "zigzags," were carried for five hundred yards over a sandy strip of land, not three-fourths as wide as Fort Wagner, and bounded by marsh and ocean. At spring tide the surf filled the trenches. In front were forts Wagner, Gregg and Sumter; a little to the right of Sumter was Fort Moultrie, and to the left Fort Johnson, and a long line of batteries on James Island, designated by the men after their respective characters, as "Bull of the Woods," "Mud Digger," "Peanut Battery," etc. The fire of all these forts and batteries was concentrated on this narrow compass—the work-shop of thousands, upon which mortars, Columbiads, Blakeleys, Armstrongs, Brooks and Whitworths, and shells of every caliber and kind, from the thirteen-inch mortar to the vindictive Whitworth, unceasingly fell. Shout "Cover" to any survivor of that terrible siege, and he will unwittingly look in the air for a coming shell. The storm of iron was attended by a continual "zeeb" of bullets from Fort Wagner. On the night of the 23d of July the Fourth planted chevaux-de-frise, and dug a trench for the parallel. In this terrible place, on the hot blistering sand, and under the blazing sun of South Carolina, or in the murky darkness of night, lighted by bursting shells, these defenders of the Union toiled unflinchingly for forty-six days. Bodies of the dead and wounded were continually being carried from the trenches. In the fierce excitement of battle, it is comparatively easy to face death, but to advance slowly, day after day, amid the dead and dying is far more horrible than charging the cannon's mouth. Constant labor, the intense heat, and brackish water, caused disease which disabled more than half the number; and indeed those who stoutly resisted and manfully performed their duties became almost ghastly thin.

In the meantime Fort Sumter was rendered a huge, inoffensive pile of brick dust. The "Swamp Angel" tossed shells into the doomed city, and a sap was dug from the fifth parallel to the very ditch of Fort Wagner. On the morning of the 7th of September the line was formed for a final charge, when the news came that the fort was evacuated. For once the shovel had triumphed over the bayonet. Fort Gregg shared the same fate, and both were afterward rebuilt and named for General Strong and Colonel Putnam, both of whom fell in process of their reduction. The cool air of autumn brought renewed health, and the winter was passed in the ordinary routine of garrison and fatigue duty in the various forts and on picket duty on the island.

About the middle of January, 1864, the Fourth was ordered to Beaufort, South Carolina, where it was on garrison duty, and where the work of re-enlisting commenced under charge of Capt. F. W. Parker. In a week three hundred men had enlisted anew for three years, or during the war.

On the 20th of February the regiment embarked on transports and proceeded to Hilton Head, and thence to Wilmington Island, up the Savannah river, and landed on Wibmarsh Island, seven or eight miles from Savannah, for the purpose of capturing a large number of negroes, engaged, under the direction of the rebel troops, in erecting fortifications to defend the approaches to the city. The force consisted of the Fourth New Hampshire and Eighty-fifth Pennsylvania, under command of Col. Howell, of the latter regiment. The expedition proved a failure, the troops re-embarked, and the Fourth was ordered to proceed at once to Jacksonville, Florida, where they arrived on the 23d, and were at once put at work erecting defenses for the city, preparatory for an expected attack from the enemy, which, however, did not come. On the 26th the regiment again embarked and sailed for Beaufort, South Carolina, where they arrived the next day.

The number of re-enlisted men had been increased to three hundred and eighty-eight—the largest number re-enlisted in any New Hampshire regiment—all of whom received a furlough for thirty days, and under command of Colonel Bell, started for New Hampshire, and arrived on the 7th of March. The new recruits and the original men of the regiment who did not re-enlist, to the number of over two hundred, remained at Beaufort, under command of Lieut. Colonel Drew. On the 12th of April this detachment sailed for Fortress Monroe, and reported to General Butler, commanding the Department of Virginia and North Carolina. They were ordered to Gloucester Point, York River. During the month the veterans returned, and the Fourth was brigaded with the Eighth Maine, Fifty-fifth and Ninety-seventh Pennsylvania, under command of Col. R. White, of the Fifty-fifth, General Ames commanding the division, which formed a part of the Tenth Army Corps, in the Army of the James.

On the 4th day of May this army started on transports for Bermuda Hundred, up the James river, where they arrived on the 6th. A line of works extending from the Appomattox to the James, six miles from Bermuda Hundred, was immediately thrown up. On the 9th an advance was made, and Ames' division tore up several miles of the Petersburg and Richmond Railroad, and then, by a hasty march, joined the Eighteenth Corps at Swift Creek, where the enemy in force were attacked, and after a sharp fight, driven to the defenses of Petersburg, on the Appomattox. At night the rebels made a charge, but were severely repulsed. Next morning, heavy firing was heard in the direction of Gen. Terry's command, stationed at Lempster Hill, to repel any advance from Richmond. Ames' Division hurried to the scene of action, but did not arrive until after the enemy had been handsomely repulsed. After one day's rest the army of the James started "on to Richmond." Slight skirmishing occurred on the first day. At night a heavy rain set in, and the troops lay down to rest upon ground where the rebel General Hoke had encamped the night before. The next day the Fourth advanced along the railroad, the Eighteenth Corps having the right and the Tenth Corps the left. A few hours brought them to the first line of the defenses of Richmond, when skirmishing at once commenced. A rattling fire was kept up until nearly night, when Terry's Division, having made a detour, came upon the rebel flank, and the Third New Hampshire, supported by the Seventh, made a desperate and bloody charge. The Fourth was ordered to charge the works in front, and forward they went with a rush, over fences and ditches, and planted the flag on the ramparts which the enemy had hastily left. Gen. Gillmore now rode up amid repeated cheers. The Eighteenth Corps captured the right of the line the same evening, and thus the outer line of defenses was secured. The storm which had not ceased, raged with greater fury than ever, when news came that a large cavalry force was advancing on the Union line of communication, to cut off their supplies, so through a drenching rain, deep mud and intense darkness, the Fourth hurried to guard against this threatened attack. At Chesterfield Court House, five miles from the starting point, they were met by a volley from the enemy's carbines. Two companies were thrown out as skirmishers, and the regiment was formed in hollow square to receive cavalry, and there, having reached the point to be guarded they remained all night. Early next morning the regiment was ordered back to aid in taking the second line of the enemy's works on Drury's Bluff.

On the 14th day of May, the Fourth supported a battery, under a provoking fire, and at night relieved a portion of the skirmish line on the right of the railroad. In front, between them and the rebel lines, for a distance of five hundred yards, was a thick growth of underbrush, affording fine cover for the enemy. The 15th was passed in continual sharp-shooting, and at night a light breastwork was thrown up. On the morning of the 16th a dense fog covered the earth. The rapid rolling of a heavy fire of musketry was heard on the right.

The enemy were reported to be advancing in front, and the men put themselves in a position of defense and calmly awaited the foe. Suddenly a line of rebels sprang out of the mist, as if by magic, within three rods of the Union line; but they as quickly disappeared, for every rifle was emptied with deadly aim, and bayonets were fixed for close work. The enemy, rallied by their officers, whose voices could be distinctly heard, advanced, and again retreated, with ranks fearfully shattered by another volley. The Union troops were formed in one line, with intervals of three paces, and had there been the least flinching the line would have been lost. Besides this the cartridges were nearly expended. The fire on the right grew heavier and nearer every moment, and seemed to break to the rear. An order from General Butler for the whole line to charge, put the troops in good spirits; they vainly supposing that affairs were prosperous, when, suddenly, the troops on the right of the Fourth, retreated in disorder. The brigade, however, advanced to charge, and were quickly met by a counter charge, the enemy appearing in overwhelming numbers in front and in rear of the right flank, within a few yards, virtually making prisoners of a portion of the regiment; but the men could not understand it in that light, and after doing all that men could do, they retreated under a perfect hail of bullets, from the right, left and front. Many fired at the enemy within a few feet and ran from under their bayonets. Corporal Plumer, of Company E, shot a rebel color-bearer ten paces off. A bullet pierced Capt. Clough's hat, and when he took it off a shell took the crown out. The air seemed filled with missiles of death. Col. White, commanding the brigade, was taken prisoner, when Col. Bell rallied the men and held the enemy in check until a line could be formed sufficient to cover the retreat.

The Fourth lost one hundred and forty-two men in this action, in killed, wounded and missing. Major Sawyer received a bullet wound in the shoulder, of which he died at home on the 23d of June. He was a brave officer and a most worthy man, respected and beloved by all who knew him. Lieut. Frank B. Hutchinson, of Company E, was last seen firing his revolver within a few feet of the enemy. He knew no fear and shirked no duty. Capt. Wallace, of Co. C, was again severely wounded. The regiment marched back to Bermuda Hundred with sadly diminished ranks. On the 21st a severe skirmish took place, in which Lieuts. Brewster of Company B, and Stearns of Company C, were badly wounded. Several enlisted men were also more or less severely wounded, and twenty were taken prisoners.

On the 28th of May the division left Bermuda Hundred on transports, with orders to report to Gen. W. F. Smith, commanding the Eighteenth Corps, which was ordered to report to Gen. Meade, commanding the Army of the Potomac. They landed at White House, on the Pamunkey river, and there marched to Cold Harbor, on the 3d of June, where they arrived the morning after the battle. Eight days of living and fighting in the trenches followed, when on the 12th the Eighteenth Corps was ordered back to White House, and the next day went on boats down the Pamunkey and York rivers and up the James to Bermuda Hundred.

On the 16th of June the Corps crossed the Appomattox at Broadway Landing, and marched directly to the defenses of Petersburg. The outworks were handsomely taken by colored troops, and a heavy line of earthworks developed, extending from the river over an interval and along the bluff, two miles from the city. The corps was formed in line, the colored troops on the left, and the division temporarily commanded by

Gen. Brooks next. It lay under fire until five o'clock in the afternoon, then made a charge and captured the works. Col. Bell's brigade took one hundred and twenty-five prisoners and several pieces of artillery. Gen. Smith rode up and complimented the men for their gallantry. From the 16th of June, until the surrender of Lee in April of the succeeding year, Gen. Grant's shattered but unflinching army, stretching along from the Appomattox to a point beyond the Weldon Railroad, fought many bloody battles and endured untold hardships.

The brigade returned to Bermuda Hundred on the 18th, but was ordered back to the lines before Petersburg, arriving there on the 23d. For thirty-six days Col. Bell's brigade remained in one position, on the left of what was afterward named Fort Stedman, and joined the Ninth Corps. The advance picket trench was within two rods of the enemy, the main line being a short distance in the rear. An attempt to capture the enemy's advance trench was made on the 30th of June. Col. Bell opened a furious fire from the picket line, while another brigade was to charge. There was a blunder somewhere, and the result was a heavy loss and nothing gained. The regiment lost fifty men in killed and wounded, while performing ordinary trench duty. This was one of the darkest times during the rebellion—thousands of noble men lost, and not a complete victory gained. Only once was there a cessation of fire. One morning the "Yanks" and "Johnnies" simultaneously dropped their rifles, and in a minute were together swapping coffee for tobacco, and pleasantly chatting together.

The regiment took part in the famous battle of the "Mine," on the 30th of July. The previous night the Division, under command of Gen. Turner, was quietly withdrawn from the front and massed in rear of and near the covered way leading to the Mine. About half-past four o'clock in the morning the earth was shaken by the explosion, and the artillery immediately opened. It was a grand commencement, and seemed, as a man remarked, "like forty-four Fourths of July rolled into one." The crater of the blown up fort was quickly taken by a part of the Ninth Corps, in which was the Sixth, Ninth and Eleventh New Hampshire. Col. Bell's brigade advanced on the right and took a position under a terrible enfilading fire from a battery just across a ravine, on a knoll. Men were literally mowed down, and lay dead as if in ranks. A sharp fire upon the rebel gunners saved them from greater loss. A division of colored troops was ordered up, but they had never been under a heavy fire before, and acted very much like other raw troops. The plan was to charge immediately, but something was wrong, and the troops suffered for the blunder. The air seemed filled with bursting shells, the hiss of canister, and the shriek of raking grape. The heat was intense, and many men fell from sun-stroke. The rebels made an advance in strong force, the negroes became panic stricken, and instead of retreating, mixed up in awful confusion. They formed a breastwork for the rebels, for to fire was to hit them, and to advance was impossible. It seemed an easy thing to beat back the rebels if the negroes had been out of the way. This delay gave the enemy the advantage, and so the Fourth retreated to the intrenched line. Col. Bell reformed his brigade, planted the colors on the earthworks, and held the line until relieved, at four o'clock in the afternoon, by Gen. Stevens' brigade. The regiment lost fifty out of two hundred men, in killed and wounded. Capt. Clough, commanding the regiment, was wounded when the retreat commenced, and Capt. Parker took command. That night the regiment took its old position in the trench, and the next day marched to Bermuda Hundred, under a burning sun, from which the tired soldiers suffered very much. Here the regiment had twelve days of rest, except their turn on picket.

Another movement was to be made north of the James, simultaneously with one on the Weldon Railroad. The Tenth Corps crossed the river in the night of the 13th of August, and at break of day the leading brigade took the enemy's outer line of works. The negroes handsomely redeemed their reputation, which had suffered at the Mine, by making a successful charge. The Fourth was engaged all day in skirmishing. The next day a movement was made to get in rear of the enemy's line at Malvern Hill, which was accomplished by Grant's well known flanking operations. One brigade was kept closely skirmishing with the enemy, while another moved around to the right. A sorry accident closed the incidents of the day. Tim Reardon, a tall Milesian, of Company G, mistaking the position of our forces, rode into the enemy's lines with sixteen canteens of whisky; "a drop of comfort" for the Johnnies, but a sad mistake for poor Tim and his expectant comrades. During the night, while guarding one of the main thoroughfares leading to Richmond, Lieut. Stephen J. Wentworth, of Company K, a brave young officer, fell while leading his company forward as skirmishers, in a sharp encounter with the enemy who made their appearance in a thick wood.

On the morning of the 16th Gen. Terry's Division, in a gallant charge, took a strong line of works in the rear of Malvern Hill. The enemy advanced in strong force and attempted to recapture the line. The division slowly withdrew behind the breastworks, but with heavy loss. The enemy closely followed, and charged fiercely on the line of works, but were sent quickly back with broken ranks. Several officers in command of the brigade, were wounded, and Capt. Parker, of the Fourth, succeeded to the command, and while the forward movement was being made, directed the change of position; but in his turn was disabled by a severe wound in the neck, just as the enemy were repulsed. A second charge was made by the rebels with more success. The Fourth lost in the action forty-five men killed and wounded. Capt. Hobbs, of Company A, took command of the regiment, and the Tenth Corps shortly withdrew to Bermuda Hundred. A captain was in command of the brigade, and only one captain was left for duty in the Fourth Regiment.

After a few days of rest the Second Division was again moved to the front of Petersburg, and took position under the constant dropping of iron and lead from the rebel lines. The time of enlistment of the original men expired on the 18th of September, when Lieut. Col. Drew, several other officers, and one hundred and seventy-four enlisted men took their departure for New Hampshire. Of the three hundred and eighty-eight who re-enlisted in February, and over seven hundred recruits, only a small number remained fit for duty, and at the attack on Fort Gilmer, on the 29th of September, only forty men could be mustered for the fight. This was one of the most bloody battles in which the regiment was ever engaged. Until near the middle of December the Fourth was engaged in picket and trench duty north of the James.

On the 12th of December, an expedition against Fort Fisher having been planned, a fleet with a large number of troops on board, left Hampton Roads, and landed on the 24th. After a careful survey Gen. Weitzel decided that the fort was impregnable by direct assault, and the expeditionary corps returned to their former position north of the James, and went into winter quarters near the picket line. A second expeditionary corps against Fort Fisher was organized, in which Gen. Terry was to command, and Gen. Ames was to do the hard fighting, composed of troops who had shown valor under the most trying circumstances. Every man of the Fourth Regiment, capable of doing duty, was brought into the ranks, and the regiment was commanded by Capt. John H. Roberts. On the 13th of January, 1865, the fleet moved into line and opened fire. The troops were landed through a heavy surf on a hard beach, about five miles north of the fort. Gen. Paine's division and Gen. Abbott's brigade were sent to prevent an advance from the enemy above. Gen. Ames formed his division across the narrow tongue of land which separates Cape Fear river from the ocean, and moved forward about two miles toward the fort, where he threw up a hasty line of works and made a careful reconnoissance. The bombardment, scarcely paralleled in history, which paved Fort Fisher with iron, continued without cessation till three o'clock on the afternoon of the 15th. This was one of the very strongest of the rebel works, and it was to be determined whether or not it could be taken; and this little veteran division, consisting of men from New Hampshire, New York, Pennsylvania and Indiana, led by Gen. Ames, had this momentous question entrusted to their hands. It was a duty to make the stoutest heart quail. A force of marines at first charged the sea-face of the fort, and were repulsed after a gallant fight. Just at the instant when the rebel garrison were crowding to the sea-face, exultant with their victory, and pouring their fire into the retreating marines, Gen. Curtis' brigade dashed forward upon the angle near Cape Fear river, closely followed by Pennypacker's and Bell's brigades. The movement was successful. The gate and one mound were gained, though the road to the former lay over a broken bridge, enfiladed and crossed by a murderous fire. Gallantly leading his brigade, Col. Bell had almost gained the bridge, when a shot struck him, and he fell mortally wounded. A moment later and the tattered colors of his regiment were planted on the first mound of the fort. Thus fell the Colonel of the Fourth New Hampshire, dearly beloved and deeply mourned by his brigade. Dignified, yet genial; brave, yet cautious; never sacrificing lives uselessly; ever ready to share danger and hardship with his men; no influence or peril could deter him from doing his duty, or shake a resolution once formed.

The gate and captured mound formed the base of operations against the rest of the fort, though to any but iron nerved men it would have proved but a slender foothold; for the rebels still had the advantage of superior numbers—twelve mounds to one, and Fort Buchanan below, to rake the inside of the work. Admiral Porter kept up a continued and harassing fire. The division fought with the greatest desperation. The fire of the enemy was well directed and incessant. The contest continued till after ten o'clock in the evening, and nine of the traverses were taken. The men were almost exhausted and the ranks were fearfully decimated. The enemy's fire had almost ceased when Gen. Abbott's brigade entered the fort, and the remainder of the rebels soon after surrendered. The fierce and prolonged struggle was over, and victory was proclaimed by a blaze of rockets from the fleet and the triumphant cheers of the men on shore. Instances of individual gallantry in the Fourth Regiment were numerous, and many of them will never be known to the world. Capt. Roberts, who had been in every battle, siege and march of the regiment, was very active and efficient throughout the fight. Adjutant Challis was disabled in the first of the fight by a piece of shell, but recovered in time to assist in taking the fifth traverse, in which were rallied the colors of seven different regiments within the space of a few feet. There was a terrible conflict to gain the seventh, and quite a number of attempts had failed, when Adjutant Challis collected thirty-five men from the several regiments of the division, and charged directly upon the rebel garrison. The fight was short, desperate and successful. Color Sergeant Plumer, who had planted the flag on the first mound, now, in advance of all, placed the broken standard on the eighth mound, so near the rebel flag that the stars and stripes actually flapped against the southern cross. About this time he fell badly wounded. Capt. Huckins, of Company K, was specially complimented for his coolness and efficiency while acting upon the staff of Gen. Ames, who was the leader and guide of every movement of the contest. That night, as all that were left of the Fourth New Hampshire were sleeping over a magazine, it suddenly exploded, thus adding to the already long list of casualties.

The regiment remained at Fort Fisher until the 11th of February, when the advance on Wilmington was commenced. Capt. Parker, who had been wounded at Deep Bottom, had been commissioned Lieutenant Colonel, and having recovered from his wound, returned to the regiment and assumed command. The rebel forces under Gen. Hoke were stationed at Sugar Loaf Battery, about two miles from the Union picket line. A night expedition, planned to get into their rear, failed. Ames' division was ordered to Smithfield, on the opposite side of Cape Fear river, where they joined Gen. Cox's division of the Twenty-third Corps, and by a rapid movement on the night of the 18th, invested Fort Anderson, just in time to find it evacuated, and the garrison of three thousand men gone. They were pursued and fled beyond Wilmington, leaving the city in the possession of the Union army. Here the regiment had a period of needed rest. On the 10th of March the Tenth Corps marched to join Gen. Sherman on information that he had arrived at Fayetteville. Sherman's whole army passed the Corps at Cox's Bridge, fresh from their battle and victory at Averysboro. After a short rest the Tenth Corps was detailed to open and guard the railroad from Wilmington to Goldsborough. The Fourth was stationed along the road between Wilmington and Little Washington. Supplies having been forwarded to the main army, the whole force once more pushed on to finish the enemy. Lieut. Col. Parker and Adjutant Challis were captured when a short distance outside the picket line, by a squad of Wheeler's cavalry; thus being afforded the pleasure of seeing the rebel army collapse, when the news was received of Lee's surrender.

Through the exertions of Gov. Frederick Smyth, the Fourth was mustered out, and arrived home on the 27th of August. The city of Manchester gave them a grand reception. Gov. Smith welcomed the regiment in an eloquent speech.

One hundred and forty veterans returned with the regiment. Fifty were mustered out in hospitals. During the four years 1394 men were members of the Fourth. Of these 282 were killed in action or died of disease; 340 were discharged for disability occasioned by wounds or disease, and 57 died in rebel prisons. Thus after four years of arduous and honorable service, the Fourth Regiment ceased to exist as an organization, and its members returned to their peaceful avocations.

FIFTH REGIMENT.

The Fifth Regiment was raised under the same call and paid the same bounty as the Third and Fourth. It rendezvoused and was mustered into the United States service at Concord, its muster being completed on the 26th of October, 1861, and reported ready for active service. The whole organization numbered ten hundred and ten, including a good band and a corps of buglers, attached to each company, and it left the State for the seat of war, on the 29th of October. The colors were presented by Gov. Berry, and received by Col. Cross with appropriate and earnest speeches. Previous to the day of departure the men were given three days furlough, in which to visit their homes and friends, and to many of them it was, alas, their last visit. The following were the field, staff and company officers of the regiment, and their record, during its term of service :

COLONEL EDWARD E. CROSS.

Colonel Cross was born at Lancaster on the 22d of April, 1832. His father, Hon. Ephraim Cross, was once a State Senator, and his mother was a daughter of Hon. Richard C. Everett, of Lancaster, who had been an Associate Justice of the Court of Common Pleas. With such education as he could acquire at the public schools and an academy, at the age of fifteen years Col. Cross entered the printing office of the Coos County Democrat, published by Hon. James M. Rix, where he remained two years, when he went to Canada, to assist his father in steamboat-building, and visited the cities and other places of interest in British America. When twenty years old he went to Cincinnati, Ohio, and was for a time employed as a reporter in the Atlas office, and was afterward local editor of the Cincinnati Daily Times. He was for two sessions of Congress special correspondent of that paper at Washington, during which time he also wrote spicy letters for the New York Herald and other influential journals, in all of which he displayed considerable ability as a political and general writer. While at Washington he was appointed Adjutant of an Ohio regiment of infantry raised for service in Utah, but for some reason the regiment was not mustered into service. In 1857 Col. Cross traveled extensively in the United States and Canada, and contributed a series of interesting letters to the newspaper press.

Afterward he journeyed to the "Plains" of the far West, to the wild Indian region of northern Minnesota, and the country of the Yellow Medicine River and the Upper Missouri. While visiting the latter places he was associated with a party of trappers and buffalo hunters, during which they had several encounters with the Sioux and Cheyenne Indians. During these travels Col. Cross wrote letters for different newspapers and prepared several illustrated articles upon travel for popular magazines. He also wrote many sketches and gems of poetry over the signature of "Richard Everett," which were quite generally admired. In 1858, with a small party, he started for Arazona, with a view to establishing a mining company in that then newly organized territory. They took with them the first steam engine and printing press transported across the Rocky Mountains. Their journey was seventeen hundred miles in length, extending through northern Texas via El Paso del Norte and La Mesilla, and requiring six months for its accomplishment. A great portion of the way lay through the wild and romantic regions of the Comanche and Apache Indians. These tribes were then very hostile to the whites, and the little company of pioneers were in constant danger of attack. At one time Col. Cross, with five of his companions followed a warlike band of Apaches for fourteen days, two of whom were killed and several wounded. In these skirmishes he won the reputation of an intrepid Indian scout and fighter. On one occasion the party were three days without food and thirty hours without water. Finally, rendered almost insane by hunger, they came out on New Year's day at the overland mail station at Apache Pass in Arizona. The expedition was not successful on account of the limited number of whites in the territory and the frequent inroads of hostile tribes of Indians. A paper was established called the "Arizonian," while editing which Col. Cross had difficulty with a Lieut. Mowry, and by him was challenged. This was the general mode of settling personal difficulties in that country, and Col. Cross did not feel that he could decline the challenge and retain the respect and confidence of the people among whom he was settled. They fought with rifles at thirty paces. At the first fire Mowry's ball grazed Col. Cross' right cheek, while the ball of the latter passed through the Lieutenant's coat. At the second round Mowry's rifle missed fire, and he claimed the privilege of shooting at his opponent unarmed. The affair now assumed a most serious character, but Col. Cross, nothing daunted, threw down his weapon and coolly folding his arms stood up to receive the fire of his opponent. Mowry, astonished and impressed at the noble conduct of his adversary, dropped his rifle and exclaimed, "I can't fire at such a man as that." Thus the unfortunate difficulty happily terminated. This event secured for Col. Cross the reputation of a man of the highest nerve and bravery.

The state of society at Arazona was at that time devoid of law and order. Lynch courts were of frequent occurrence, and Col. Cross was often called to preside over them. He twice crossed the "Plains" and visited the Atlantic States, and took out another mining company from St. Louis, Missouri. The national troops were withdrawn from the territory of Arazona and the Indians became very troublesome. Several expeditions were sent out against them, which Col. Cross invariably commanded. While he was absent on a march against the Apaches, a portion of the tribe attacked the mining company from St. Louis and murdered nearly every member of the party. During his residence in Arazona, Col. Cross took great pains to examine the country, and collect full and valuable notes of the mineral and vegetable resources of the territory. His notes upon the character and habits of the roving tribes of the "far West" were very extensive, faithfully and carefully prepared, and included five vocabularies of Indian tongues. Soon after the destruction of the St. Louis mining company, Col. Cross left Arazona and crossed over the border into Mexico, and was appointed by the military authorities of that country a "Chef de Battalion" in the ranks of the Liberal Party. When Fort Sumter was fired upon he was stationed at El Fuerte in command of a large garrison. He at once resigned his position and made his way home, arriving in New York on the 18th of August, 1861. Arriving at Concord he offered his services to Governor Berry, and was commissioned Colonel of the Fifth Regiment of Volunteer Infantry on the 27th of September, and left the State with his regiment, which had been enlisted, organized and made ready for the field under his own most active personal supervision, on the 29th of October. No regiment went to the seat of war from New Hampshire during the four years' struggle that promised greater usefulness to the Union cause than did what was soon designated and known throughout the army as the "Fighting Fifth," and none more nobly and fully realized all that was expected of it, and none from this or any other State has a prouder record to give to history. Its deeds of valor will be known and remembered as long as the great rebellion itself is remembered. In a communication to Senator Hale, of New Hampshire, Gen. Hancock remarked: "The conduct of this regiment has been heroic: in the most important battles it has been highly distinguished. To Col. Cross much of this honor is due; he has faithfully disciplined his Regiment, given it the highest tone, and always led it in battle. One of the most distinguished Generals in the army remarked that "the Fifth Regiment never changed its position under fire, except towards the enemy." On the morning of the battle of Antietam, after the regiment had crossed the Creek, they were halted and Col. Cross addressing them said: "Soldiers, the rebel army is in front; the Potomac is in their rear. We must whip the enemy this day or we shall all be disgraced and ruined. I expect every officer and soldier to do his duty like a man. No one must leave the ranks unless badly wounded. If I fall leave me on the field until the fight is over. Stand firm and fire low." The regiment went immediately into the battle and fought with bravery seldom excelled. Col. Cross was struck by two pieces of shell; one over the right eye, and one on the left cheek, and his hat was knocked off, but with his wounds bleeding and a red silk handkerchief around his head he pushed forward, and the most desperate fighting ensued. On this occasion the Fifth Regiment saved Richardson's division from being outflanked. In a private letter written on the battle field, Col. Cross said: "My brave boys, knowing that all depended upon promptly checking the rebels, raised the wild Indian yell and poured an awful volley into their ranks. Their center regiment was literally smashed to pieces, and before they could rally their forces, several regiments hastened to my assistance. Then came the most terrific fighting. I had been in seven battles before, but they were nothing in comparison with Antietam. We shot down the rebel color-bearers as fast as they could get up, killed their officers, broke their ranks and piled them in heaps among the tall corn. I never felt better in my life, and if the rebels didn't hear the Apache war whoop that day it was not my fault, for I yelled it until I was hoarse. My men fought nobly, gloriously; never wavered, never shrank. Not a man but the wounded and dead fell out. My officers also conducted themselves like heroes. As for myself I was hit five times but not seriously injured."

At the disastrous battle of Fredericksburg, on the 13th of December, 1862, the Fifth Regiment was again in the thickest of the fight, and lost in killed and wounded many of its best officers and bravest men. Col. Cross was again wounded by a piece of shell which struck near the heart and he fell insensible. He was brought to his senses by another fragment of a shell which struck him on the left leg, below the knee. He attempted to crawl along, but a shell struck the steel scabbard of his saber, split it open and knocked him flat. In a letter describing the situation, Col. Cross afterward wrote: "Dizzy and faint, I had sense enough to lay myself out decently, 'feet to the foe.' Two lines passed over me, but soon they swayed back, trampling on the dead and dying. Halting about thirty yards in the rear, one line laid down and commenced firing. Imagine the situation. Right between two fires of bullets and shells—for our own artillery fire from over the river was mostly too short, and did great damage to our own troops—I lay on the field four hours—the most awful moments of my life. As the balls from our lines hissed over me within a foot from my head, I covered my face with both hands, and counted rapidly from one to one hundred, expecting every moment my brains would spatter the ground. But they didn't. My guardian angels—if there be such personages—or my destiny saved me. The end of my days was reserved for another, and I hope a more fortunate occasion. For if I am to die on the battle-field, I pray that it may be with the cheers of victory in my ears. When it became dark, some of my men found me and I was carried to the hospital."

The Fifth Regiment was in the battle of Gettysburg, on the 2d and 3d of July, 1863, and it was there that Col. Cross was mortally wounded. He was in command of a brigade, as he had been in several other hardly contested battles. At about six o'clock in the afternoon of the 2d, while rallying his brigade in the most gallant manner, in the streets of the town, a minnie ball entered the abdomen and came out near the spine, and after much suffering, during which he was fully conscious, at twelve o'clock he died. His last words were; "I did hope I would live to see peace and our country restored. Thank Heaven, I have done my duty. I think the boys will miss me. Oh! welcome death! Say farewell to all." His remains were carried to his native town, Lancaster, where they were buried, the ceremonies being conducted by North Star Lodge of Free Masons. His funeral was attended by a very large concourse of citizens, most of whom had known the deceased from boyhood.

COLONEL CHARLES E. HAPGOOD.

Colonel Hapgood was born in Shrewsbury, Worcester County, Massachusetts, December 11, 1830. He is a son of Jacob and Elizabeth (Eager) Hapgood. His father was for thirty-five years a celebrated gun manufacturer, at Shrewsbury, and had sales rooms in Boston. Col. Hapgood was educated at the high school in his native town, and learned the trade of gun maker, with his father. In 1851 he went to Worcester, Mass., and was for seven years employed in one of the largest produce commission houses in that city. In 1854 he married Mary Elizabeth, daughter of Charles E. Miles, of Worcester. In 1858, he removed to Amherst, Hillsborough County, New Hampshire, and in company with H. E. Abbott, of Worcester, bought out the store of C. B. Tuttle, and entered into business there under the firm of Hapgood & Abbott, which he continued until September, 1861, when he disposed of his interest in the firm to his partner, with a view of entering the army. He once enlisted as a private, but for some reason was not mustered. On the 19th of October, 1861, he was commissioned Captain of Company I, in the Fifth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers, and was continually with his regiment, sharing its hard marches, bloody battles and fatigue duty until July 9, 1862, at which time, having contracted a fever, in the campaign before Richmond, he was given leave of absence on surgeon's certificate. Subsequently, and before the expiration of his leave, Capt. Hapgood was ordered on recruiting service in New Hampshire, and was stationed at Concord and other places. On the 14th of December, 1862, immediately after the battle of Fredericksburg, in which the Fifth Regiment suffered so severely in the loss of officers and men, Captain Hapgood was promoted to Lieutenant Colonel, and at his own urgent request was ordered to join his regiment, which he did on the 3d of February, 1863. He commanded the regiment in the campaign to Chancellorsville and in the great fight at Gettysburg, on the 2d and 3d of July, 1863. On the 3d of July 1863, he was promoted to Colonel of his regiment, in place of Colonel Cross, killed in battle. He was continuously with his regiment until June 16, 1864, when he was severely wounded at the battle of Petersburg. After he had partially recovered from his wound, Col. Hapgood was ordered to Philadelphia, August 18, 1864, by the War Department, as President of the Board of Inspection of Military Hospitals in the State of Pennsylvania. He remained on this duty until October 17, 1864, when he was mustered out by order of the War Department, by reason of expiration of his term of service.

Col. Hapgood returned to New Hampshire after being mustered out of service, in a feeble state of health, from his wound and the fatiguing duty of his three years' service with one of the most active regiments in the army. He was offered and urged to accept the command of other regiments, and also honorable and responsible positions on the staff of different Major Generals, all of which, from his enfeebled state of health, and for other reasons, he felt it his duty to decline. Soon after his return home he removed to Boston and entered as a partner into a substantial mercantile firm, and is now doing an extensive and successful business as a wool commission merchant in that city, under the firm name of Charles E. Hapgood & Co.

Feeling that his country needed him in her time of peril, when the constitution and laws were set at defiance, and the Union itself was threatened with destruction by misguided men at the South, Col. Hapgood entered the military service with the most unselfish and patriotic motives and sentiments, and performed every duty from first to last faithfully and religiously. As a Christian gentleman he enjoyed the unbounded respect and confidence of the men under and officers over him. As an officer he was brave, discreet, mindful of the comfort of the men in the field, and watchful and tender of sick and wounded in hospital, and set an example to all of sobriety and probity worthy of imitation.

MAJOR EDWARD E. STURTEVANT.

The following biographical notice of Major Sturtevant is taken from the Adjutant General's Report of 1865, and is eminently deserved, just and true: In the Spring of 1861, when the nation called for the services of her sons, Major Edward E. Sturtevant was the first man from New Hampshire to enlist in our second war for independence; and was also the first man in this State to receive authority to recruit under the President's call for seventy-five thousand three months' men. His biographical record is brief, but honorable in the highest degree. He was born in Keene, August 7, 1826. His parents, George W. and Fanny W. Sturtevant are now living. The deceased was bred to the occupation of a printer in his native town; but removed to Concord soon after completing his apprenticeship, and found employment in the office of the New Hampshire Courier, then in charge of John C. Wilson, Esq., in whom he found a generous and faithful friend. He was subsequently employed in the office of the Statesman, and at a later period upon the columns of the Washington Union, and the Richmond Dispatch, everywhere establishing a good name as a practical printer.

He was naturally, however, of too active and venturesome a spirit to be content with any sedentary employment, and in 1855 he accepted an appointment as one of the police force for the city of Concord, in which capacity he won an enviable reputation for shrewdness, fidelity and pluck. He held this position until the inauguration of civil war. Dropping without a moment's hesitation the pursuits of civil life, he was immediately appointed a recruiting officer, and in a few days, by his own personal influence and example, he enlisted two hundred and twenty-six men and received a commission as Captain in the First Regiment of New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry.

Major Sturtevant was influenced in taking up arms, mainly by a correct and thorough appreciation of the great principles which were at issue. He had, however, a natural fondness and aptitude for military life. In former years he marched at the head of the militia of the State capital, where he was often especially commended for the drill and discipline of his command. But Major Sturtevant was no holiday soldier. He had little fondness for parade and show. His spirit chafed at the inactivity which characterized the bloodless campaign of the First New Hampshire, and immediately on the expiration of his first term of service, he was ready again to take the field. He felt that he had enlisted for the war. In all his letters to his friends, he manifested no weariness nor impatience in the service to which he had devoted his energies—no thought of turning his back to the enemy till death or victory released him from personal obligation to his beloved country.

On the organization of the "Fighting Fifth"—an honorable epithet which the deceased did his full share to win and maintain—he was commissioned as Captain of Company A. During the protracted and harassing fatigue-duty of this gallant regiment, on every toilsome march, in every battle and skirmish, up to the hour of his death, Major Sturtevant was with his command. Could his nameless grave be identified, it could wear no fitter, no prouder inscription than "the Rappahannock, Yorktown, Fair Oaks, Peach Orchard, Savage's Station, White Oak Swamp, Charles City Cross Roads, Malvern Hill, South Mountain, Antietam, Charlestown, Fredericksburgh."

During the "seven days fight," he was in command of his regiment, and handled his men with conspicuous skill and gallantry. Upon the resignation of Major Cook, in July, 1862, he received merited promotion, and still further distinction awaited him at the hour of his untimely death. No man more richly deserved it. In point of courage, personal endurance and capacity for securing at once the obedience and affection of his men, he had no superior in his regiment. On the skirmish line and on dangerous picket duty, he especially distinguished himself. While his regiment was building the "Grape Vine Bridge" over the Chickahominy, Major Sturtevant's company alone covered their important undertaking. Again, in the brief lull during the battle of Fair Oaks, his command was nearest the enemy. From South Mountain to Antietam, and again in McClellan's advance on Charlestown, he led the skirmish line. He loved this dangerous service. The excitement, the freedom from restraint, appealed irresistibly to his adventurous spirit; and his shrewdness, fertility in resources and strong hold on the affections of his men abundantly fitted him for the position.

He entered upon the battle of Fredericksburg, acting as Lieut. Colonel, with sad presentiments and yet with cheerful alacrity. The event justified his mournful expectations. The Fifth left scores of her bravest and best men on that blood-stained field; but none braver, none more imbued with generous impulses and manly devotion than Major Edward E. Sturtevant. The manner of his death—the place of his burial is unknown. We know only that he was seen on that fatal field at dark, severely wounded by a minnie ball; that he was buried where he would have chosen to be interred—on the field where he fell, among the nameless heroes whose interests he had ever made his own. As has well been said, “a braver man or more faithful friend, never yielded up his spirit amidst the clangor of arms and the wail of the dying. Peace to his memory.”

All the field officers of the Fifth Regiment were men of military experience and skill. Col. Cross had seen service in fighting the Indians in Arazona and the far West, and had recently returned from an important military command in Mexico. Lieut. Colonel Langley had been promoted from Adjutant of the Second Regiment, with which he was in the first Bull Run battle; and Major Cook had held important commissions in the Volunteer Militia of Massachusetts, and was an accomplished officer. The other officers of the staff and line had been selected for their peculiar qualifications for the positions in which they were placed. Thus organized the regiment gave promise of efficiency in the discharge of any duty that might be put upon it in the great war in which the country was engaged.

The regiment left Concord on the 29th of October, and arrived at Bladensburg, Md., on the 31st, and went into camp. On the 3d of November, in the midst of a rain, with roads in a very bad condition, the regiment formed a portion of Gen. Howard's Brigade ordered to Lower Marlborough, Md. They marched a distance of about fifty miles in two days, and after one day of rest, marched back over the same ground, and again went into camp at Bladensburg.

On the 27th of November the regiment marched across Long Bridge into Virginia, with Howard's Brigade, and was assigned to General Sumner's Division, and went into camp near Alexandria, at a place which was afterward known as Camp California. Here the regiment went into winter quarters, where they remained until the 10th of March. The regiment soon commenced doing picket and out-post duty at the front, and established the first line of pickets fronting the enemy at Fairfax Court House. The men were thoroughly drilled in regimental and brigade drill and in bayonet exercise. The commissioned officers were also thoroughly instructed in the practical part of their duties. Schools were established by the Colonel and Lieutenant Colonel for the theoretical instruction of officers and sergeants, during the winter evenings. A "common school" for such boys in the regiment as needed instruction in the elementary branches, was also put in operation—the necessary books being donated by the Sanitary Commission.

Through the winter the regiment furnished heavy details to build roads, repair bridges and cut timber. Measles and mumps prevailed to an extraordinary extent, yet from six to eight hundred men were all the time fit for duty, which was more than any other regiment in the entire Division could turn out.

On the 10th of March the Fifth Regiment formed the advance guard of Sumner's Division, when it moved from Camp California on Manassas, Major Cook commanding the skirmish line. The march to Warrenton was a severe one and very trying to the men, the weather being cold, much of the time rainy, and the roads in the most despicable condition, and almost impassable for the men, to say nothing of baggage trains. They had no tents, wagons or cooking utensils. These hardships were endured for thirty-one days, and yet there were but very few men in the regiment not fit for duty. On the 28th of March Gen. Howard commanded a reconnoissance in force from Warrenton Junction to the Rappahannock River, eight miles, for the purpose of forcing the enemy to cross the river and burn the railroad bridge. The Fifth formed the advance, Lieut. Colonel Langley commanding the skirmish line. The enemy were driven all day, the bridge and railroad depot burned, and the rebel forces shelled out of their position. Here the regiment first came under fire—the skirmish line from the enemy's riflemen, and the main body from shot and shell. The behavior of the Fifth on this expedition and its important service, gained great praise from the commander of the forces.

On the 4th of April the regiment embarked at Alexandria for the Peninsula, without having returned to Camp California for tents and regimental property. On reaching Ship Point the men were obliged to wade from the vessel to the shore, and camp on the wet ground, without tents. The regiment detailed daily about three hundred men to work making corduroy road through a swamp, and building bridges, in which the men showed such good qualities as to be highly complimented by the General in command. When the siege of Yorktown commenced the Fifth was sent to join the Engineer's Brigade, under General Woodbury, with which they performed much heavy work. They built a tower one hundred feet high and forty feet base, of heavy timber, for an observatory at General Headquarters which was about completed when the enemy evacuated Yorktown.

The next day after the evacuation of Yorktown the regiment marched for Williamsburg. They started just at dark, in the midst of a severe rainstorm, the roads being in the worst possible condition. A halt was not made until near morning, when the tired men dropped down in the mud to sleep. News came that the battle had been won, that the enemy were in retreat, and the regiment marched back to Yorktown, whence on the 11th of May they embarked on the steamer C. Vanderbilt, and were carried up York river to West Point, and from thence marched to the Chickahominy river and went into camp. Here amid the pestilential vapors and miasma of the swamps many of the men grew sick, and several died. On the 28th Col. Cross was ordered to construct a bridge across the Chickahominy swamp and river, capable of bearing artillery and wagons. A Minnesota regiment had commenced the work on the previous day, but had been ordered away. The swamp was flooded from one to four feet deep with water, and nearly half a mile wide. On one border was the channel of the stream, over thirty yards wide and quite deep. The swamp was a mass of huge trees, vines, brushwood, and old wrecks of trees and shrubbery. The labor was vigorously begun, and with some assistance from small detachments from two New York regiments, the bridge was built. It was supported by piers composed of heavy logs, and seventy rods in length. It was completed before dark on the 30th—just in time for Sumner's Corps to cross the next day, in season for Sedgwick's Division to check the enemy. It was afterward known as "Grape-vine bridge," and was the only one on the river above Bottom's bridge which successfully resisted the current swollen by rains; and on the 31st of May it bore, in their passage across, its builders, as they hurried to the field of Fair Oaks. During the night the enemy were discovered within three hundred yards, and the regiment took several prisoners. At daylight Col. Cross captured a rebel courier with important dispatches.

On the morning of the 1st of June two or three hundred rebels were discovered close to the right flank, whom the skirmish line of the Fifth drove out on the run,—and thus opened the great battle of Fair Oaks, on the 1st of June, 1862. Richardson's division moved forward to engage the enemy, and the lines meeting, the most terrible conflict ensued; one after another all the other regiments of the division became engaged, and still the enemy held his position, until, at last, word came to Col. Cross that General Howard was wounded, and he was in command of the brigade, and the Fifth was wanted. The Colonel formed his line squarely in rear of the spot where the fight was hottest, and as the line engaged in front retired, moved it forward through a swamp, over the rebel skirmish line, into a thick pine wood, where the rebel line lay, waiting for a new line to demolish. The Fifth immediately opened fire upon the enemy, and from eight hundred rifles death sped to the rebel ranks. The intensity of the musketry exceeded that of any the regiment ever heard afterward, and for twenty minutes, the bullets flew through the woods, when they missed the human marks, splintering and severing the trees and branches for hundreds of yards. Col. Cross was wounded in the thigh, and Major Cook was struck by a bullet in the leg, and one hundred and eighty-six had been killed and wounded, when the rebels gave way and left the Fifth in possession of the field. The dead of the Fifth lay within thirty yards of the rebel dead. Thus ended the battle of Fair Oaks, with twenty minutes' work of our regiment. The Fifth fired the first and last shot in this great battle, and suffered as much loss as any regiment upon the field. Now under command of Lieut. Col. Langley, the regiment went into the trenches before Richmond, where it remained for a month, and afterward retreated with the rest of the army to Harrison's Landing, fighting and skirmishing at Savage Station, Peach Orchard, White Oak Swamp, Charles City, and Malvern Hill, in all of which the regiment lost over one hundred officers and men. Lieut. Colonel Langley being sick, the regiment was commanded most of the time by Capt. Sturtevant, and behaved well on all occasions.

From Harrison's Landing the Fifth marched to Newport News, where Col. Cross joined them and assumed command. The regiment soon sailed to Alexandria, landed, and marched to its old locality, Camp California, where it arrived on the night of the 28th of August. On the 29th the Fifth marched to Arlington Heights, where the men, ragged and battered, and many without shoes or blankets, hoped as they pitched their tents in sight of Washington, to be permitted to rest and be clothed; but on the 30th, the sounds of artillery being heard in the direction of Manassas, hurried orders were received in the afternoon, to leave all tents and blankets, and march, to re-enforce Gen. Pope. They marched twenty-three miles with only one halt, and then laid down in the rain, on wet ground to rest. Some of the men had no shoes, and their feet were blistered and bleeding. The next day they were marched to the front, and formed the skirmish line in face of the enemy; which position they held until the entire army moved away, when they fell back and joined the main body at Fairfax Court House, being the last regiment that left Centerville. From this place the regiment marched to within a short distance of Chain Bridge, twenty-six miles, without a single straggler. The next day they marched into Maryland and camped at Ten-allytown, where a few shoes and some clothing were obtained for the men. On the 4th of September the regiment marched to Frederick, Md. After marching through Frederick they camped near the battle-ground of South Mountain but were held in reserve during the battle.

BATTLE OF ANTIETAM.

On the 15th of September Richardson's Division, of which the New Hampshire Fifth Regiment formed a part, crossed the South Mountain, in pursuit of the enemy. The Fifth was ordered to the front and deployed as skirmishers. In this position they drove in the cavalry of the enemy and discovered the rebel line of battle beyond Antietam river. In the pursuit the regiment captured over sixty prisoners, and Col. Cross said they might have taken more, but he could not spare the men to pursue them. All the remainder of the day and until late at night, the Fifth engaged the enemy's sharpshooters, driving them from a strong position. When relieved the men were nearly exhausted. The next day four companies were sent to hold the enemy's riflemen in check, and prevent their burning an important bridge over the Antietam river, while other companies were sent to destroy obstructions in the river. On the 17th, the day of the great battle, the Fifth went into the fight with three hundred rifles and nineteen commissioned officers. The regiment behaved nobly, and in the language of the official report "was entitled to the sole credit of discovering and defeating the attempt of the enemy to turn the left flank of Richardson's Division. They captured the large state colors of the Fourth North Carolina Regiment in this fight, and by permission of the War Department, it is now deposited in our own State. It was seized by Corporal Nettleton, of Claremont, who although wounded, brought them off the field. For this act of bravery he was promoted to Lieutenant, and was mortally wounded at the battle of Fredericksburg, on the 13th of December, and died of his wounds a few days afterward. During the battle the Fifth, being hardly pressed and affairs assuming a desperate character, Col. Cross, his face streaming with blood from wounds in his forehead, and blackened with powder, and his head bound round with a red handkerchief, hurrying to every part of the line, bade the men "put on the war paint," by rubbing the torn ends of the cartridges over their faces; and then calling for the "war-whoop," he raised his own voice into the battle cry, and was followed by every man, until the sound rose above that of artillery and musketry, carrying defiance to foe and encouragement to friend. The men plied the rammers, and fired as fast as possible, and "fire!" "fire!" "fire faster!" rang along the line from the officers. Men became almost frantic; guns could not be loaded fast enough; those of the wounded were seized and even the arms were taken from the hands of the rebel dead and discharged at the heads of their living comrades. A rebel standard bearer waved his flag defiantly within a few yards. "Shoot the man with the flag!" shouted twenty voices, and he was leveled to the dust with his flag. Still they pressed on, and more desperate grew the chances, when Col. McKean, of the Eighty-first Pennsylvania, seeing the situation of the Fifth, brought his regiment from the right, of his own accord, and forming in a line with the Fifth, opened a roaring fire of "buck and ball," on the enemy, which, with the unceasing fire of the Fifth, speedily drove the enemy off. Soon after the Fifth, being sadly cut up and very tired, was relieved, and placed in a position further to the left, behind the crest. During the afternoon the regiment lay under severe artillery fire, which the enemy continued on the left of the line, during which its beloved commander, General Richardson, was mortally wounded while directing the fire of a battery. He had been among the bravest of the brave, and had charged on foot, sword in hand, with the front line. He was succeeded by General Hancock, who of all others, perhaps, could best fill his place. The battle raged from the right of the line to the left, where Burnside was engaged, at intervals, until night; but the Fifth was not again called on. On the 18th it was only employed in skirmishing. A detachment of recruits fresh from New Hampshire, arrived on the field, and Col. Cross caused them to arm themselves from the slain. On the 19th the rebels had retreated.

In this battle over one hundred thousand men and five hundred pieces of artillery had been engaged on both sides, with a loss to the enemy of near fifteen thousand men, a number of guns and colors, and a loss on the Union side of twelve thousand four hundred and sixty men, and not a gun or color. From three hundred and nineteen officers and men of the Fifth, who went into the fight, one hundred and eight had been killed and wounded. Among the killed was Second Lieut. George A. Gay, a gallant young officer, lately promoted for meritorious conduct. Among the wounded was Second Lieut. Charles W. Bean, a young officer of great promise, who died of his wounds soon after. Gen. McClellan, in his report of operations, highly complimented Col. Cross and his regiment, by a personal notice. It was in this battle that the regiment earned the title of "The Fighting Fifth."

On the 21st Gen. Hancock's Division encamped on Boliver Heights, and during the rest of September and nearly all of October, the Fifth remained inactive, with the exception of marching on one reconnoissance to Charlestown, Va., in which it came under fire for a few minutes. The time was employed in drill and picket duty, and the regiment was once more fully clothed and equipped. Major Cook resigned on account of wounds, and Capt. Sturtevant of Company A, was promoted to Major, his commission dating from July 3, 1862.

The Fifth had now been in the service a year, and a most eventful year it had been. During the year the regiment had received one hundred and forty-six recruits, making the total strength for that period eleven hundred and fifty-six. Two officers had been killed and seventeen wounded. Sixty men had lost their lives in battle; two hundred and forty had been wounded, and sixteen were missing, making the whole loss in battle three hundred and thirty-five. Sixty-nine died of disease, twelve officers resigned, four were dismissed, one hundred and thirty-five men were discharged, and fifty-one had deserted. Of the eleven hundred and fifty-six who had belonged to the regiment during the year, four hundred and forty-nine had been lost in various ways; and of the seven hundred and seven remaining on the rolls but three hundred and twenty-three were present for duty.

On the 29th of October the march was taken up, and the division moved across the Shenandoah and down the Loudon Valley. On the 3d of November the Fifth Regiment came under fire at Snicker's Gap, and about the 14th the tents were pitched at Falmouth. Log huts were built and covered with tents, and the regiment once more went into winter quarters.

BATTLE OF FREDERICKSBURG.

On the 11th of December the Second Corps was massed opposite Fredericksburg, and a portion of it effected a crossing under a severe fire from the enemy's infantry among the houses in the city. On the 12th the whole Corps had crossed on pontoon bridges, which had been thrown over the Rappahannock river, in the face of the fire of sharpshooters and infantry. On the morning of the 13th commenced the great battle of Fredericksburg, which proved so disastrous to our troops under Gen. Burnside, and in which the Fifth New Hampshire Regiment lost many of its bravest and best men. Hancock's Division charged across the plain toward the heights where the rebels were strongly intrenched, under a destructive fire, while our artillery on the opposite side of the river were throwing shell and solid shot into the town. The advantage was with the rebels from the first; for their batteries, securely covered by works on the heights, poured the most accurate and rapid fire through the advancing lines on the plain—the shots often flying into the streets of the city, or striking the houses and scattering the bricks, spread death into the ranks, long before they were within musket shot; while there were no batteries opposed which could silence them. The infantry, behind a stone wall, could not be materially harmed by our bullets or shells, and the only hope of success on our side was to reach and dislodge them with the bayonet. Vainly did the brave men of Hancock's Division strive to accomplish this work, but its ranks melted away; the colors were repeatedly leveled, and the officers were stricken down, until but the shattered remnants of its battalions, unable to close their ranks or re-form their lines, defiantly and desperately lay down in the position they had attained, and there their colors waved until night's pitying shades fell over the field and obscured the unwavering marks of shot, shell and bullets. The Fifth was in the front line, and sustained the full fury of the fire. A shell burst in front of Col. Cross, and he fell, apparently lifeless. Major Sturtevant was mortally wounded, and died upon the field. The regiment swept on in the stern ardor to win the fight. In Major Sturtevant the regiment lost an honest, earnest patriot and soldier, and one who would share his blanket and his last crust with a fellow soldier. The colors of the regiment were shot down again and again; alternately upraised by a sergeant, a corporal, a private, or an officer; and in their heroic efforts to keep the line closed and advancing, and the colors up, fell three captains—the valiant Murray, the noble Perry, and the young and courageous Moore. Lieut. Nettleton, who was promoted at Antietam, was mortally wounded, and Lieut. Little, returning from home, where he had been recovering from wounds, arrived on that fatal day, just as the regiment was moving forward, and hurried to join his company only to receive a mortal wound. The survivors of the regiment reached a corn-field, within a few rods of the enemy, and these—a mere skirmish line—held their ground; and among the foremost Lieut. Ballou, an accomplished gentleman and brave officer, met his death. When night came the regiment moved to the city, without one hundred and eighty-six officers and men who had marched out in the morning to fall victims to a most unfortunate blunder. Col. Cross was carried from the field, and subsequently recovered from his wounds to die upon the field of Gettysburg.

After the battle of Fredericksburg, and under cover of darkness, the division recrossed the river and went into camp at Falmouth, and the Fifth Regiment employed the succeeding months in picket duty, drill and recruiting its shattered strength. Col. Cross, after an absence of several weeks returned to the regiment with a set of new colors, to replace the old ones which were sent home. Returning officers and men raised the number to near two hundred, and the regiment, which had resembled a company after the Fredericksburg battle, started on the spring campaign of 1863 with the semblance of a battalion.

Captain Charles E. Hapgood was promoted to Lieut. Colonel, December 14, 1862, in place of Lieut. Colonel Langley, resigned, and Captain Richard E. Cross was promoted to Major on the same date, in place of Major Sturtevant, killed in battle. Early in January, 1863, Gen. Hooker succeeded Gen. Burnside in the command of the army, and reorganization and refitting were the order of the day.

In the latter part of April, 1863, the Fifth Regiment was moved up the Rappahannock river, and distributed at the houses through the country in the vicinity of Banks' Ford, for the purpose of preventing communication between the people and the enemy during the movements of the army preliminary to its passage across the river. The Fifth occupied twenty-seven houses.

On the first of May the Fifth, with two other regiments, which had been performing similar duty, marched under the command of Col. Cross as a provisional brigade, arriving on the field during the progress of the action at the Chancellorsville House, and was at once placed in the line of battle. At night they slept upon their arms, and the next morning the Fifth supported a battery, the men lying between the guns. Later in the day a skirmish line under command of Colonel Miles, of the Sixty-first New York Regiment in which a detail of the Fifth was posted, performed the extraordinary feat of repelling an attack of the enemy in column; and toward evening, when the Eleventh Corps was routed by the enemy, and sent flying across the plain, sixty of the fugitives were caught by the Fifth, and retained in the ranks, and some of them were afterward killed or wounded. During the afternoon of the 3d the army retired to a position nearer the river, and during its movements to Col. Cross was given the arduous and desperate duty of holding the enemy in check at the Chancellorsville House, until it was accomplished. The enemy approached on the front, the flank and the rear, and threatened to envelope the small brigade which was in his path; but under a severe fire it held its ground steadfastly, wheeling or facing to each point, as it was assailed. A battery which was left with the brigade, having lost its officers and nearly all its men and horses, was silenced by the severe fire of the enemy, when Col. Cross himself sighted and fired a piece at the approaching enemy, and was about to man the battery by men from the Fifth, when his brigade was ordered to follow the army, and the battery was brought away by hand. The enemy closed rapidly on the retiring column, and for some time shot and shell crashed through with destructive effect. A short distance to the rear a new line was taken up, where, in hastily constructed earth works, the army remained until the 5th, when it recrossed the Rappahannock, and although withdrawn, it has never acknowledged itself whipped in that battle. The Fifth lost nearly forty officers and men. Another stay of a month was made at Falmouth, the time being employed in preparing for the summer campaign, which opened in June.

On the 9th of June a detail of a hundred and thirty men from the Fifth Regiment formed a part of the picket force of infantry which accompanied the cavalry of the army on a reconnoissance in force across the Rappahannock. Colonel Cross commanded the detail from the Second Corps, which arrived at Kelley's Ford in the evening. Instructions were issued for the infantry to cross and drive the enemy away on the other side, to protect the crossing of the cavalry. The passage was effected in canvas boats before light on the next morning, by Col. Cross' command, and the enemy were driven away by a skirmish line.

The cavalry crossed and pushed for Brandy Station, when there speedily ensued one of the memorable cavalry battles of the war. Col. Cross' command rejoined its corps in a few days, and with it moved up to Thoroughfare Gap, and from thence across the Potomac at Edward's Ferry, through Poolsville, Md., to Frederick City. Gen. Couch was relieved and Gen. Hancock assumed command of the Corps, which placed Gen. Caldwell in command of the division and Col. Cross in command of the brigade—the command of the regiment devolved upon Lieut. Colonel Hapgood. On the 29th the regiment marched thirty-two miles, and on the 1st of July reached the field of Gettysburg.

BATTLE OF GETTYSBURG.

On the morning of the 2d of July, the brigade took position in the line, on that well remembered crest, in open field, where it remained until five o'clock in the afternoon, when it moved toward Round Top. The Fifth, detached from the brigade for a short time to hold a road, rejoined it at six o'clock, to enter at once into the fight which raged on the right of Round Top. The whole of Gen. Caldwell's division became engaged in a very sanguinary conflict, in which the rebels strove to drive the line back, and thereby envelope the left flank of the army. The Fifth stood its ground unflinchingly, and Col. Cross, ever solicitous for its good conduct, came from the center of the brigade to its front, and there encouraging his men, he fell mortally wounded by a bullet in the abdomen, and was carried off the field. The regiment fired away all its ammunition but five rounds, and then being relieved, was among the last to leave the field. It was immediately placed in support of a battery, where it remained until about nine o'clock in the evening, when it rejoined the brigade, and resumed its position of the morning.

On the morning of the 3d the regiment constructed a line of rude intrenchments, and in them lay under the tremendous artillery fire of the day from the enemy's batteries, and during the attack of their infantry, which was so terribly repulsed. Its skirmishers took thirty prisoners, and the regiment was first to discover the retreat of the enemy. On the 5th the regiment marched from the field, leaving four officers and eighty-two men killed and wounded, out of twelve officers and one hundred and sixty-five men who went into the fight. What remained of the Fifth marched down the Loudon Valley to Warrenton, and then it was ordered to Point Lookout, Md., on the 26th; but at Washington the destination was changed to Concord, N. H., where it reported at draft rendezvous, on the 3d of August. During a stay at Concord of nearly three months the regiment was recruited to the minimum strength, and Lieut. Colonel Hapgood was promoted to Colonel, Major Cross to Lieut. Colonel, and Captain Larkin, of Company A, to Major. The regiment again left the State for the seat of war early in November, reached Point Lookout on the 13th, and was placed under command of Brigadier General Gilman Marston, in company with the Second and Twelfth New Hampshire Regiments, and employed in guarding rebel prisoners confined at that place.

On the 27th of May, 1864, the regiment again marched for the field, and joined the brigade commanded by Col. Miles, in the Second Army Corps, on the 1st of June. The army was then in the midst of that grand campaign from the Rapidan to the James, and on the night of the arrival, the Fifth marched with its Corps and reached Cold Harbor in the evening of the next day, and threw up a line of breastworks. In the general assault on the enemy's works on the 3d, the Fifth moved forward about half a mile, under a severe fire, at the double quick, but refrained from firing a shot until it had carried the works in its front and captured one gun and a number of prisoners. The pursuit of the enemy followed at once, and continued for three hundred yards, when the regiment alone met a fresh line of the enemy, and engaged it at short range. A fierce struggle followed, in which the only hope of victory was based upon the probability of the seasonable arrival of supports, as the enemy brought an overpowering force to bear upon the regiment; but those on the flank had failed to break through the rebel lines, and the enemy remaining in their front turned fiercely on its flank, and, aided by those who had surrendered, treacherously taking up arms and firing into its rear, compelled it to retire, desperately striving to retain each foot of ground. But bravery and valor were unavailing, and the works were relinquished, though the fight did not cease until the last man was over, and Capt. Ricker was seen to stop, and with one cut of his sword kill a rebel gunner in the midst of his section. Captain Goodwin, an officer of lion heart and noble bearing, was killed inside the works. Lieutenant Humphrey, a young and gallant officer, was killed between the lines, and Lieutenant Spaulding received a wound through the lungs, which caused his death afterward. He was a brave soldier and an honorable man. The total loss of the regiment in this engagement was two hundred and two officers and men. The recruits in the regiment showed great courage and steadiness throughout this whole affair, and were commended on all sides. A new line of works was constructed close to the enemy, and in them the regiment constantly suffered losses from the unremittent fire of the enemy, until the 12th of June. The march was resumed and the James River was crossed on the 15th, and on the 16th the Fifth again went into action, on the right of its division, in the attack on the enemy's works at Petersburg, in which it lost thirty officers and men, killed and wounded. Among the killed was Lieutenant Shapleigh, a reliable and esteemed officer. Colonel Hapgood was among the wounded, and the command of the regiment devolved on Major Larkin, under whom it moved out of the works on the 17th, in line of battle, and performing the manœuvre, always difficult under fire, of changing front, moved up close to the enemy's works, and there, for two hours and a half, standing on a rise of ground, and completely exposed, maintained so accurate and rapid a fire on the enemy that his line was unable to remain standing in the works. One hundred and sixty rounds of ammunition per man were expended before the regiment was ordered to desist. The loss was twenty-nine killed and wounded. On the 18th seven men were lost in gaining a position on the Norfolk Railroad, and on the 21st the regiment aided in repelling an attack of the enemy on the works near the Jerusalem Plank Road. From the 24th of June to the 13th of July the Fifth was kept in the works on picket, and in support of the cavalry; after which time, until July 26th, it was employed in the various operations of the siege.

On the 27th of July the Fifth, with its brigade, was engaged in the action at Deep Bottom, and captured a line of works from the enemy, with four guns and a number of prisoners. The regiment received commendation from Gen. Hancock, commanding the Corps, in general orders, for its good conduct in the movements across the James. On the 30th, Captain Butler, of Company K, who while serving on the staff of Maj. Gen. W. F. Smith, was wounded in an action near the Hare House, on the 30th, of June, died from his wound, after arriving home. He was an officer much respected for his valor and other soldierly and gentlemanly qualities.

On the 13th of August another march was made across the James river, and the Fifth with its Corps, was again engaged with the enemy near Charles City Cross Roads, the scene of one of the battles of 1862. The Second Corps recrossed the James, and moved out on the Weldon Railroad, tearing up and destroying it to Ream's Station, where the enemy was again encountered. The line of battle, formed in a half circle, was broken through by a sudden attack of the enemy, and Miles' brigade, enveloped on one flank, was driven back, leaving some artillery; but its invincible commander led his men forward again without delay, and the Fifth rescued the only guns which were saved on the field. The regiment lost thirty-three of its number, among whom was Lieut. Robert H. Chase, killed. He was a young officer lately promoted, who as a Sergeant in the action of the 17th of June won for himself honorable notice from the commanding officer of the regiment.

The Fifth went into the trenches in front of Petersburg, where for three months it was occupied with the most arduous and dangerous duties of the siege, during which time its losses amounted to about one hundred and fifty officers and men. About the middle of October the ranks of the regiment were again filled with a large number of substitutes, including many "bounty-jumpers," who took the earliest opportunity to desert to the enemy. Some of them bent their guns before leaving, which led to the belief that they were Canadian rebels. Some of them were afterward captured and made to suffer the penalty of death to expiate their crime.

On the 12th of October, the three years' term of enlistment having expired, those men who had not re-enlisted, and such officers as desired, were mustered out of the service, and returned home to New Hampshire, under Col. Hapgood. Capt. Crafts was promoted to Lieut. Colonel, Capt. Livermore to Major, and Ass't Surgeon Childs to Surgeon. The regiment being reduced in number below the minimum, was organized into a battalion of eight companies and a fraction.

In December the Second Corps moved to the extreme left of the line, and occupied Fort Welch, which was at the salient angle of the left flank of the works in front of Petersburg. Here the regiment was drilled, clothed, equipped, recruits raised, a company of New Hampshire Sharpshooters consolidated with it, and again assumed its old position among the reliable regiments of the corps; but through the seeming unjust operation of the mustering regulations, the regimental organization of ten companies could not be resumed.

When, in the last days of March the Army of the Potomac commenced those operations which culminated in the surrender of the army of Northern Virginia, the Second Corps moved from its intrenchments, crossing Hatcher's Run, and extending its lines five miles toward Dinwiddie Court House, Miles' Division, to which the Fifth belonged, forming the left of the line. For three days the enemy was continually encountered in the dense woods and thickets on the Run, and the Fifth, though always in the front line, fortunately suffered but little. On the night after the battle of Five Forks, Miles' Division moved out toward that field, and joining Gen. Sheridan, swept down the rebel works on the next day, where the grand assault had proved successful, and the rebels had begun their retreat; and pushing toward the Appomattox, in pursuit, it encountered three rebel divisions at Wells' Church, where in hastily constructed works, they sought to arrest our advance until the remainder of their army on that field might cross the river. It was of the utmost importance that they should not accomplish their object, and the gallant General Miles, regardless of their superiority of numbers, at once attacked their position by assault. Twice he was repulsed with severe loss; but undauntedly moving on the third time, his gallant division poured over the works into twice its numbers, and captured five hundred prisoners, while the remainder fled toward the river. Half a battery was also captured, and some colors. The enemy was vigorously pursued for three days, and on the morning of the 6th of April, when the whole army moved forward to attack him at Amelia Court House, where he was supposed to be resting, his rear was discovered in full retreat toward Lynchburg, by the Second Corps. Not a moment was lost in attacking him, and the retreat was soon changed into a rout. The course pursued by the enemy was a succession of hills and valleys, which afforded eligible positions for resistance, which the enemy availed himself of at five different times during the day, when his rear guard, of five or six thousand men, forming its line on the crests, strove to retard our advance upon the trains, which could be seen flying over the hills. The Second Corps formed in line of battle two miles in length, the whole front covered by skirmishers and with three brigades in reserve. The Fifth was in the front line during the whole day. The whole line moved forward together, and when it arrived in front of the position chosen by the rebels for defense, halting just long enough to discover the approaches, it invariably sent them flying after their retreating columns. The road for twelve miles was strewn with abandoned wagons and impediments of every kind, attesting to the terror of the fugitives. Just as the sun went down the enemy's train was discovered at Sailor's Creek at a halt, with the bridge and ford blocked so that a passage was impossible. On either side of the creek there rose lofty hills. On the crest of one of them between our advance and the creek, the rebel rear guard made an obstinate stand, but with one grand charge the Second Corps swept it over the hill across the creek, and up the next, and triumphantly took possession of the train. Darkness closed on the wearied men, who in the twelve hours of light had marched thirteen miles, fought five times, and captured fifteen hundred prisoners, three cannon, eleven colors, and a train of near two hundred wagons. Some hundred thousand dollars of "Confederate" money was captured in the train, with which our soldiers perpetrated the pleasantry of paying off the prisoners in their hands. The Fifth lost twenty-three men killed and wounded during the day.

The pursuit was resumed on the next morning. The Appomattox was crossed at High Bridge, a structure two thousand feet long and eighty feet high, which was set on fire at the west end, by the rebels, who, forming line of battle, endeavored to retard the advance of our troops until it should be materially injured; but they were soon put to flight, and the bridge, which promised to be of the utmost importance in future operations, was saved by the exertions of Major Livermore, of the Fifth New Hampshire Regiment, of Major General Humphrey's Staff. At a short distance from Farmville the rebels made a stand with their whole army against the Second Corps—the only infantry across the river—and the cavalry. They skirmished with the rebels all day, not having force enough to warrant a direct assault, expecting the arrival of re-enforcements. Near sundown all the companies of the Fifth but two, which remained on the skirmish line, with two other regiments, were selected to make a charge. The Fifth was commanded by Capt. Ricker, Lieut. Colonel Crafts being in command of the skirmishers. The country between the enemy's works and the right flank of the corps, from which point the assault was to be made, was a succession of abrupt hills and difficult ravines, presenting great obstacles to a rapid movement. The regiment moved forward, and almost immediately the enemy opened with both a direct and cross fire, and one of the most bloody battles in which the Fifth had been engaged during the war, ensued. Close to the works the colors of the regiment were taken by the enemy. Lieut. Ryder, a gallant officer, was killed, and Capt. Collins, a brave man, was mortally wounded. Both of these had joined the regiment from the Engineers Corps. Capt. Ricker, in the most persistent efforts to carry his line forward, fell with three wounds—one of which he had borne all day—after having two horses shot under him, and was taken prisoner close to the works. The loss of the Fifth on this day was six officers and one hundred and four men killed and wounded, and four officers and sixty-three men taken prisoners. The next day the regiment moved again in the pursuit, when Capt. Ricker was recaptured. On the 9th, the shattered remnant of the Fifth having followed to the surrender, received back its colors, which it had fairly won from the rebels, together with the release of the captured officers and men.

After the surrender of the rebel army, the Fifth marched through Richmond to the vicinity of Washington, and in May marched in grand review before the President. On the last of June it started for Concord, and was mustered out of service on the 8th of July, 1865.

During the three years and nine months that this regiment was in the service, it had borne upon its rolls the names of about twenty-six hundred men. It lost from the casualties of war about fifteen hundred, about thirteen hundred of which were in actions. Sixteen of its officers were killed or mortally wounded in battle.

The foregoing sketch of the Fifth Regiment has been taken mostly from the Adjutant General's reports, and serves to give but a faint and imperfect idea of its valuable services during the war; its desperate and bloody battles, than which none from this State can show a longer list; its hardships in the trenches opposite Petersburg and on working details; its fatiguing marches and privations incident to war, all of which the men endured with uncomplaining patience and bravery. Were a full history of its operations attempted, a much larger volume than the one in hand would be required to contain it. Instances of individual gallantry on the part of officers and men in that regiment are so numerous that a list of them would be too great for present limits; and a roll of its killed in battle would appear almost incredible. May a grateful country do the Fifth New Hampshire Regiment of Volunteers justice—written history never can.

COLONEL NELSON CONVERSE.

Colonel Nelson Converse resides at Marlborough in Cheshire County. He has held several commissions in the State militia, running through a long term of years. In 1860, when a reorganization of the militia was made throughout the State, Colonel Converse was appointed Major General of the Third Division. In October, 1861, it was determined to raise the Sixth Regiment, and that it should rendezvous at Keene. Captain Mack, of the regular army, a native of Cheshire County, was appointed Colonel, and Nelson Converse, Lieut. Colonel, and was to take the general charge of raising the regiment and making it ready for the field. He was very active and efficient in the performance of this trust, and his extensive acquaintance enabled him to enlist the requisite number of men in a very short time. It was finally found that Captain Mack would not be relieved from the position he held in the regular army by the War Department, and Lieut. Colonel Converse was promoted to Colonel on the 26th of October. He went to the seat of war with his regiment, and commanded it until the 8th of March, 1862, when, in consequence of ill health, he resigned. While he commanded the regiment its duties were mostly in camp, at Hatteras Inlet, North Carolina. It was not called into action at all until after Colonel Converse had resigned.

GENERAL SIMON G. GRIFFIN.

General Griffin was born at Nelson, Cheshire County, New Hampshire, on the 9th of August, 1824. He received a thorough academical education, and for several years was engaged in teaching. While thus engaged he represented his native town two years in the popular branch of the New Hampshire legislature. He commenced the study of law with Alvah Wood, of Exeter, continued with Messrs. Flint & Bryant, of Concord, was admitted to the bar in Merrimack County in the autumn of 1860, and immediately commenced practice at Concord. When news came of the assault on Fort Sumter, Gen. Griffin at once turned his attention to military affairs and commenced the study of military tactics. He and a number of other young men formed a company, and at its organization he was chosen its Captain and commissioned by Governor Goodwin. This company, assisted by citizens of Concord, procured Sharpe's breech-loading rifles, and afterward became the famous Company B, of the Second Regiment, New Hampshire Volunteers, noted for its efficiency as skirmishers and sharpshooters. He commanded the Company during the first battle of Bull Run, on the 21st of July, 1861.

In October, 1861, Capt. Griffin was promoted to Lieutenant Colonel, and transferred to the Sixth New Hampshire Regiment, which was then being enlisted. In March, 1862, Colonel Converse resigned, and the command of the regiment devolved upon Lieut. Col. Griffin. On the 7th of April he commanded an expedition composed of six hundred men, assisted by five gun boats from the Navy, to Elizabeth City, North Carolina, which resulted in the capture of seventy-four prisoners, three hundred and fifty stand of arms, ammunition and other property, the killing of one rebel and the wounding of two others in the attack, and the breaking up of a rebel rendezvous at that place. He also commanded the regiment at the battle of Camden, N. C., on the 19th of April, where by its conduct it won a good reputation as a fighting regiment, and was permitted, in general orders, to inscribe "Camden, April 19, 1862," upon its colors. On the 22d of April Lieut. Colonel Griffin was commissioned Colonel of the Sixth Regiment. He commanded the regiment at the second battle of Bull Run, on the 29th of August, 1862, and in the battle of Chantilly, on the 1st of September, on both of which occasions the regiment acted with great bravery. At the battle of Antietam, on the 17th of September, Col. Griffin, with his regiment and the Second Maryland, charged the stone bridge across Antietam creek, and although checked at first by the murderous fire of the enemy, succeeded in carrying the bridge, and the Sixth, with Col. Griffin at its head, was the first to form its line on the height beyond. He commanded his regiment at the battle of Fredericksburg, on the 13th of December, where it lost seventy-five men killed and wounded, being about one-third of its entire strength. On the 20th of May, 1863, Col. Griffin was assigned permanently to the command of the First Brigade, Second Division, Ninth Army Corps. Early in June the brigade went, under command of Col. Griffin, to the assistance of Gen. Grant in his operations against Vicksburg, and participated in its capture. He was also with his command in the campaign of Gen. Sherman against Gen. Joe Johnston, and the capture of the city of Jackson, Miss., in July, where he was in charge of the Ninth Corps, having three brigades under his command. In August the Corps returned to Kentucky, and a part of it immediately proceeded across the Cumberland Mountains to join Gen. Burnside in his campaign in East Tennessee, Col. Griffin being in command of the Second Division of the Ninth Army Corps. In October, Col. Griffin was sent by Gen. Burnside to bring forward the remainder of the Ninth Corps, which had been left in Kentucky, but was finally assigned to the command of Camp Nelson, at that time a large and important post, as the rendezvous of the Tennessee refugees, to the number of about nine thousand, who were there formed into regiments.

In the spring of 1864 the Ninth Corps was re-organ-zed at Annapolis, Md., and Col. Griffin was assigned to the command of the Second Brigade, Second Division, composed of the Sixth, Ninth and Eleventh New Hampshire, the Thirty-first and Thirty-second Maine, and the Seventeenth Vermont regiments. He commanded his brigade in the battle of the Wilderness, May 6th, 1864, and also in the battle of Spottsylvania Court House, on the 12th, in the latter of which it saved Gen. Hancock's Corps from being routed. It was in this battle that Col. Griffin acted with such consummate skill and gallantry as to win a Brigadier General's commission, on the recommendation of Gen. Grant. He was in command of his brigade at the battles of North Anna River, May 20th and 21st, Ptolopotamy Creek, May 31st, Bethesda Church, June 2d, and Cold Harbor, June 3d.

On the night of the 16th of June General Griffin, in command of his own and Gen. Curtin's brigade, made an adroit and successful attack on the enemy's intrenched lines in front of Petersburg, carrying their works for a mile in extent, capturing nearly one thousand prisoners, besides four pieces of artillery, caissons and horses, more than a thousand stand of small arms and a quantity of ammunition. Gen. Potter, commanding the division, entrusted the whole planning and execution of this attack to Gen. Griffin, and most skilfully did he carry out his part of it. He had made a wide breach in the enemy's lines, and there was nothing to prevent an advance into the city, had supports come up in time. But the other corps were not ready to advance, and when, at three o'clock in the afternoon, the First and Third Divisions attacked, the enemy was prepared to meet them, and they were repulsed with immense slaughter. Gen. Griffin commanded his brigade in the assault on the "Mine," July 30th, at the battle of the Weldon Railroad, on the 20th of August, the battle of Poplar Spring Church, on the 30th of September, and at the battle of Hatcher's Run, on the 27th of October.

On the Second of April, 1865, Gen. Griffin arranged and led the assault on the enemy's lines at "Fort Hell," on the part of the Second Division, Ninth Army Corps, which gave us Petersburg and Richmond. At the commencement of the action Gen. Potter, commanding the Division, was severely wounded, and was succeeded by Gen. Griffin, who exhibited throughout the greatest activity, bravery and skill. For "gallant conduct" in this battle he was breveted a Major General of U. S. Volunteers—a brevet that was worth something, for it was won sword in hand, on one of the most bloody fields of the entire war. He retained command of the Division and joined with the Corps in the pursuit and capture of Gen. Lee's army. He returned with the Division to Alexandria, and was mustered out of the United States service in September, 1865. His service was constantly at the front, and never, during the whole war, did the troops of his command make a march or come under fire in a single instance that he was not present to command them in person.

After returning home, Gen. Griffin was offered by the government a position as field officer in one of the old regiments, and his appointment was made out and sent to him; but after so thorough an experience of the hardships and privations of the field, and after the war was over and there being no real call of his country for his services, he preferred the quiet and enjoyment of home, and declined the offer. Subsequently Gen. Griffin settled in Keene, and in 1866 was elected in that town to a seat in the popular branch of the Legislature, was re-enlisted in 1867 and 1868, and served both of the last two years as Speaker of the House. Few men who entered the army from any State can show a more honorable record in the field than that made by Major General Simon G. Griffin.

COLONEL PHIN P. BIXBY.

Colonel Bixby is a native of New Hampshire. When the war broke out, in 1861, he was engaged in trade at Concord, as a member of the firm of Webster & Bixby, doing a thriving business. But he felt that his country had claims upon him and needed his services, and determined to abandon his peaceful pursuits and enlist for the war in some capacity. He tendered his services to the Governor, and on the 30th of November, 1861, was commissioned Adjutant of the Sixth Regiment, New Hampshire Volunteers. He performed the duties of this position to general acceptance. He was in the second battle of Bull Run, on the 29th of August, 1862, was wounded, taken prisoner and carried to Libby Prison, Richmond, where he was kept five or six weeks, and then exchanged, re-joined his regiment about the middle of October, on the 15th of which month, Major Dort having resigned, he was commissioned Major in his place. Major Bixby was again wounded on the 15th of July, 1864, in front of Petersburg, in consequence of which he was absent from his regiment about three months, during which time, on the 28th of July, 1864, he was promoted to Lieut. Colonel, in place of Lieut. Colonel Pearson, killed at North Anna River. He was most of the time in command of his regiment, until the last battle of Petersburg, when he was in command of a brigade. Gen. Potter was wounded, Gen. Griffin took command of the Division and Col. Bixby succeeded to the command of the brigade, which position he held until after the surrender of Lee. After the promotion of Col. Griffin, Lieut. Colonel Bixby was promoted to Colonel, on the 21st of February, 1865. He was also appointed Colonel of United States Volunteers, by brevet, "for gallant and highly meritorious conduct in the assault before Petersburg, Va., to date from April 2, 1865." He continued with and commanded his regiment until the 17th of July, 1865, when he was mustered out with it. He was with his regiment in all its hard marches and battles from the date of his first commission until the close of the war, except during the three months that he was laid up with wounds received in front of Petersburg. After the close of the war Col. Bixby returned home, and is now in business at Concord, with his old partner, Mr. Webster. He was a brave soldier, and always at his post ready for duty.

LIEUT. COLONEL HENRY H. PEARSON.

Lieut. Colonel Pearson was born at Newport, Ill., on the 26th of February, 1840. In 1854 he removed with his family to Bloomington, and soon after determined, if possible, to obtain a liberal education. His father being in moderate circumstances, young Pearson went resolutely to work in a lumber yard at Lincoln, on the St. Louis Railroad, in order to obtain means to meet the expenses of a preparatory college course. He had a great passion for study and books of almost all kinds, and more especially biographies and history. In 1860 he came to Exeter and entered Phillips Academy, where he was soon distinguished as a close, faithful and able scholar. His dignified deportment, uniform good nature and forbearance gained for him the good will and respect of his instructors and associates. All who knew him saw that he had a purpose; that his mind was filled with noble aspirations, and that he promised to signalize himself in whatever pursuit in life he might adopt.

On the breaking out of the rebellion, in April, 1861, young Pearson was fired with true military ardor and patriotism, and determined to enlist and fight the battles of his country against treason and rebellion. He at once left the academy and started for the seat of war, and walked all the way from Baltimore to Washington, where he at once joined a military company, with which he served until after the first disastrous battle of Bull Run. He then returned to Exeter, and in the autumn of 1861 was commissioned Captain by Gov. Berry, and set himself vigorously at work to raise a company, at the same time reading the best histories he could obtain of the military campaigns of Napoleon, and making plans of his great battles. He was most delighted with the movements on the field of Waterloo, and drew diagrams of them. The war reports of McClellan, Mordecai and Delafield were read by him with great interest, and digested and remembered. In order to raise his company he appointed war meetings in towns in the neighborhood of Exeter, and addressed the people with modesty, simplicity and marked effect. On the 22d of November he left Exeter, with nearly a full company, for Keene, and joined the Sixth Regiment, then being organized there. His company was assigned its proper place in the line, and lettered C. Soon after, and before leaving the State with his regiment, the people of Exeter presented Captain Pearson with a handsome sword and other substantial testimonials of their regard and esteem.

In April, 1862, he led his company against the enemy at Camden, N. C., and also at Bull Run, on the 29th of August, on both of which occasions he behaved with great coolness and bravery, and commanded his company with consummate tact and skill. He afterward wrote interesting sketches of these two battles and made diagrams to accompany them, all of which were published. These papers disclosed keen discrimination and a remarkable knowledge of the principal military movements in those battles. At Chantilly, South Mountain and Fredericksburg the Sixth was in the thickest of the contest, and afterward in June and July, 1863, at Vicksburg, and Jackson, Mississippi, took a prominent part, on all of which occasions Capt. Pearson distinguished himself for coolness and gallantry. When in December, 1863, the men of the Sixth Regiment re-enlisted for a second term, Capt. Pearson, for meritorious conduct, was promoted to Lieut. Colonel of his regiment. He went into the great campaign of 1864 with confidence and zeal. In the battle of the Wilderness he led his men with discretion and bravery. On the 26th of May, at North Anna River, about twelve miles from Richmond, while reconnoitering the movements and position of the enemy with a field glass, he was shot by a sharpshooter, the ball entering his forehead. He never spoke afterward and died in a few hours.

Lieut. Colonel Pearson was a man of fine natural ability, good education, of commanding figure and manner; kind and attentive to the wants of his men; always ready to share with them his blanket and last crust, which with his coolness and bravery, gained for him the love and respect of all. He controlled his men by his force of character rather than by any established rules of discipline. He was in every battle where his regiment was engaged up to the time of his death. By his superior officers and all others he was admitted to be the ablest and most accomplished officer of his rank in the Ninth Army Corps, and there was no one of any rank who enjoyed more universal respect and esteem, or whose death would have been more sincerely lamented, not only on account of his value as an officer but his worth as a man and friend.

Soon after the arrival of the Sixth Regiment at Washington it was assigned to Gen. Burnside's Division and proceeded to Hatteras Inlet, North Carolina, arriving there on the 13th of January, 1862, amidst a most terrific storm. The storm continued eight days, during which it was impossible to land the troops or proceed to any other destination. The Sixth finally disembarked at Hatteras Inlet, and went into camp of instruction, with the Eleventh Connecticut, Eighty-ninth New York, Forty-eighth Pennsylvania, and Ninth New York—Hawkins' Zouaves—reporting to Brigadier General Williams, commanding post and brigade. Here the regiment was attacked with a malignant fever, which with measles, that assumed a virulent type, in consequence of the removal of the regiment while the disease was in progress, carried off sixty men in as many days. The regiment embarked to Roanoke Island, where it arrived on the 2d of March, and went into camp as a part of the garrison of that post, under Colonel Rush C. Hawkins, as brigade and post commander. On the 8th Colonel Converse resigned his commission, and Lieut. Colonel Griffin assumed command of the regiment.

On the 7th of April four companies of the Sixth, with two companies of the Ninth New York Regiment, in all about six hundred men, under command of Lieut. Colonel Griffin, were sent to break up an encampment of rebels at Elizabeth City, N. C., and if possible capture the recruits. The expedition consisted of five gunboats and a steamer to convey the troops. The expedition left Roanoke Island at night, and was to make the attack at daylight the next morning. In the attack one rebel was killed, two wounded and seventy-four made prisoners, the remainder taking to the woods upon the first appearance of the Union forces. Three hundred and fifty stand of arms, and a quantity of ammunition and public property, were taken, and the rendezvous broken up.

On the 19th of April, the Sixth with its brigade was in the battle of Camden, N. C. At a critical moment, after other regiments in the brigade had been repulsed by the enemy, the Sixth was ordered to advance and drive the rebels from the woods, which they occupied beyond an open field. The regiment moved forward in gallant style in line of battle, with colors flying, and immediately drew the fire of the enemy; a shell swept through the lines, near the colors, killing Curtis Flanders, of Co. I, and wounding one other; but the regiment moved steadily on without breaking its lines or firing a shot. When within musket range it halted and poured in a terrific volley, with all the coolness and precision of regular troops. The enemy broke and fled, without firing a shot. By its good conduct on this occasion the regiment established a character as a fighting regiment, and was permitted, in general orders, to inscribe "Camden, April 19, 1862," upon its colors. The loss of the Sixth in this affair was one man killed and two wounded. The success of this expedition was the occasion of a congratulatory and complimentary order from Gen. Burnside, in command of the Department of North Carolina. Congratulatory orders were also received from Gen. Reno, commanding the expedition, and Gov. Berry, of New Hampshire.

On the 22d of April, Lieut. Colonel Griffin was commissioned Colonel; Major Scott was promoted to Lieut. Colonel, and Capt. O. G. Dort, of company E, to Major, by the choice of the officers of the regiment. On the 18th of June the regiment left Roanoke Island, joined Burnside's expedition at Newbern, and was assigned to Colonel Amory's brigade, of General Foster's division. While at Roanoke Island the Sixth received such instruction in tactics and discipline as made it afterward one of the most efficient and reliable regiments in the service. When it arrived at Newbern its proficiency in drill and splendid appearance as a body of troops called forth the encomiums of general officers, and other regiments stationed there.

On the 2d of July the Sixth, with other regiments, was ordered to proceed to the peninsula, in Virginia, to join Gen. McClellan, who was retreating before Lee. They embarked and proceeded to Newport News, and instead of going up the James, to the assistance of McClellan, they disembarked at this point on the 10th, and went into camp. While in this encampment the Ninth Corps was organized, with General Burnside as its corps and department commander, and the Sixth was assigned to the First Brigade, Second Division.

On the 2d of August the Second Division, under General Reno, embarked on board transports, and proceeded up Chesapeake Bay and Potomac River, to Aquia Creek, where it disembarked, and after halting some days at Fredericksburg, marched to Culpeper Court House, and joined the army of General Pope. The disastrous campaign which followed was one of peculiar hardship and trial, and evinced the courage and endurance for which the Sixth was remarkable. On the 29th of August the retreating army found itself confronting the whole rebel force for the second time since the war began, on the field of Bull Run. At three o'clock on the afternoon of that day, the first brigade of Reno's Division was brought up, and ordered to attack the enemy and drive them from the woods in which they were massed. The brigade was formed with the Second Maryland on the right, the Sixth New Hampshire in the center, and the Forty-eighth Pennsylvania on the left, and moved forward in line of battle. Immediately upon entering the woods the command was received with a sharp and murderous fire, under which, however, the Sixth, and Second Maryland pressed steadily forward; but the Forty-eighth Pennsylvania gave ground to the right, and fell behind the Sixth New Hampshire. The regiment pushed forward in the most resolute manner, driving the enemy before them, keeping its line perfect, not a man leaving the ranks, not even to care for wounded or dead. The regiment crossed a railroad cut, and advancing one or two hundred yards beyond, it found itself assailed on every side. The wood was very thick, and amid the smoke of battle nothing could be discerned more than a few yards. Supposing the left to be supported and protected by others of our own troops, it was believed that the fire from the left and rear must be from friends. To ascertain the true state of the case, Colonel Griffin seized the colors, and advanced in that direction, waving them in the air. He was met by a murderous fire, which proved that there were no friends of the stars and stripes in that direction. Finding that his regiment would be sacrificed unless withdrawn immediately, the Colonel ordered a retreat, and brought off his men with all possible dispatch. Of four hundred and fifty officers and men who went into this engagement, thirty-two were killed, one hundred and ten wounded, and sixty-eight were missing; making a total of two hundred and ten; or nearly one-half of the whole number present for duty. Of the missing nearly all were either killed or wounded, and the wounded were all captured, as the enemy occupied the ground after the fight. Of twenty officers present on that day, five were killed, six wounded and two captured. Among the killed were Lieutenants Fuller, Ames, Moore, Prescott and Muchmore, Captains Pearson and Ela, and Lieutenants Hayes, Adams, Jackman and Titcomb were wounded, and Adjutant Bixby and Lieutenant Emerson made prisoners. The next day the Ninth Corps was again put into action on the left of the line, holding the enemy in check, and were the last to leave the field, which they did just before midnight, August 30th, and marched in a drenching rain to Centerville, where it arrived next morning, the army having made a stand there to cover the trains.

On the 1st of September the enemy made an attack at Chantilly, when a sharp engagement ensued, which resulted in his repulse. In this the Sixth was actively engaged and did good service. Advancing over a ridge of ground to support troops already engaged, they met the Fiftieth Pennsylvania just breaking and flying in confusion. Seeing the New Hampshire boys moving gallantly forward to their assistance, in a well formed line of battle, with colors flying, the Pennsylvania troops rallied promptly, and, forming on the right of the Sixth, returned bravely to the attack. The two regiments united, and, protected by a rail fence on the edge of a corn field, repulsed the attack of the enemy in that quarter, and held them in check until night put an end to the contest. During that night and the next day the army fell back to the defense of Washington, and the Ninth Corps encamped at Alexandria. While here the men were rested and supplied with needed clothing and camp and garrison equipage.

Lee and Jackson having crossed the Potomac, the army moved out from Washington under General McClellan, to repel the invasion. The Sixth Regiment moved with its brigade on the 7th of September, and passing through Frederick and Middletown, was present at the battle of South Mountain on the 13th, in which the division was commanded by General Sturgis, was used as support, and was but slightly engaged. The division occupied the ground won during the fight and the next day moved forward toward Antietam.

BATTLE OF ANTIETAM.

On the morning of the 17th of September, 1862, the troops were under arms at daybreak, and very soon afterward the Ninth Corps moved forward to attack the enemy on the extreme left. The attempt to carry the Stone Bridge across Antietam Creek, by the Eleventh Connecticut and other regiments, having failed, Sturgis' division was brought up and ordered to take the bridge at all hazards, and seize the heights beyond. The regiments selected to make this desperate charge were the Sixth New Hampshire and Second Maryland. The stream was not fordable at that point, and the road occupied by the Union troops, which led to the bridge, came down to the Creek, nearly three hundred yards below the bridge, then turned at right angles, and ran along the bank of the stream with only the narrow stream between it and the enemy, then turned again at right angles to cross the bridge. The opposite bank was a steep, high bluff, covered on its top and sides with forest trees. Behind these trees, and behind barricades of stones and of logs, the enemy was strongly posted, their fire covering every inch of ground over which our troops must pass to reach the bridge. The two regiments were formed in the field below where the road came down to the creek, some sixty or seventy rods below the bridge, directly under the fire of the concealed enemy. The remainder of the brigade lay still further down the stream, under cover of fences and corn fields, too far away to support promptly the attacking column, composed as it was of two small regiments, numbering about one hundred and fifty men each. But the order of General Sturgis was to charge at once with the regiments formed by the flank, side by side. The regiments fixed bayonets and moved at the double quick, passing through a narrow opening in a strong chestnut fence, which there was not time to remove, and charged in the most gallant manner directly up the road toward the bridge. As the attacking party, led by Colonel Griffin, debouched from the field into the road, the enemy from their intrenched position redoubled the fury of their fire, sweeping the head of the column with murderous effect. Such sweeping destruction of course checked the advanced columns, but the men sheltered themselves behind fences, logs, and whatever cover they could find, and bravely held the ground already gained, without retreating or giving way an inch. Other troops were brought up and put in position behind a bluff, directly front of the bridge, whence such a terrible fire of musketry was poured upon the enemy that they abandoned their position and fled. Four regiments now advanced across the bridge without opposition, and the Sixth was the first to advance up the bluff beyond, and from its line on the top of the ridge, where it received a shower of shot and shell from the rebel batteries in the distance. The Ninth Corps crossed the creek, formed its lines and advanced to attack the rebel right. During this movement, which was at first successful, some of the troops advanced as far as the village of Sharpsburg itself. The Sixth having suffered severely in the early part of the day, was held in reserve. The corps was finally driven back just in advance of the brigade, and that night the regiment was again put into the front line, to perform picket duty. In this most severe battle the Sixth behaved with great gallantry, and was highly complimented by General Burnside. It suffered a loss of nearly one-fifth of its whole number present, in killed and wounded. A few days after the battle the whole corps passed over Maryland Heights, and encamped in Pleasant Valley, where it remained for several weeks.

On the 4th of October Lieut. Colonel Scott, who had been absent, sick, since the regiment left Newport News, resigned, and Captain Henry H. Pearson, of Company C, was promoted to fill the position. Major Dort also resigned, and Adjutant Bixby, who had been exchanged and rejoined the regiment, was promoted to Major.

On the 27th of October the army moved from Pleasant Valley, crossed the Potomac by pontoon bridges at Berlin, took up its line of March up the valley east of Blue Ridge, with Richmond for its objective point. Near Waterloo Bridge, the enemy appeared on the right flank, and Sturgis' division was sent out to hold them in check. Considerable skirmishing ensued, in which the regiment was engaged, but suffered no loss.

On the 19th of November the army arrived at Fal-mouth, in front of Fredericksburg, and encamped on high ground north of the Phillips house.

BATTLE OF FREDERICKSBURG.

On the 12th of December a part of the army crossed the river and occupied the city of Fredericksburg. The Ninth Corps bivouacked in the streets that night. The bloody assault upon the enemy's works commenced about noon on the 13th. About one o'clock, p. m., the Sixth Regiment advanced with its brigade under a shower of shot and shell, and entering the field to the right of the railroad, moved steadily up the slope against the enemy's works. That slope was completely swept by the rebel musketry and artillery fire, and in some places the ground was already covered with dead and wounded; yet nothing could exceed the coolness and gallantry with which the regiment advanced to the charge. Desperate and repeated attempts were made to advance over the crest and attack the enemy in their works, but so destructive was the fire immediately upon reaching the brow of the hill, so perfect was the knowledge of the enemy of every movement of the Union troops, and so completely had the rebels the command of the ground, that it was found to be impossible to get at them. Three regiments immediately on the right of the Sixth, broke and fled, leaving a large gap, yet not a man of this regiment left his position or faltered for a moment. This perilous position was held until dark, when the line was withdrawn and took shelter in the town, leaving only a line of pickets to hold the crest. When the army withdrew across the river the Sixth was one of the last regiments to retire. In this engagement the regiment suffered a loss of seventy-five men, or about one-third of the number that went into the action, killed and wounded.

Early in February, 1863, the Sixth regiment was transferred, along with its corps, to Newport News, where they had good quarters, were supplied with clothing, camp and garrison equipage, a thorough system of drill was adopted, and the condition of the troops was brought up to the highest state of perfection. On the 18th of March Gen. Dix, commanding the Department, reviewed the whole corps. The display was one of the most brilliant ones ever seen in this country.

General Burnside having been ordered to the Department of the Ohio, the Ninth Corps was transferred to Kentucky at his request, and proceeded to Cincinnati and thence the Sixth Regiment, with its brigade was sent to Lexington, which place it reached on the first of April, and after encamping there for a few days, marched to Winchester. From Winchester it proceeded to Richmond on the 18th; to Paint Lick Creek on the 3d of May, and to Lancaster on the 10th. Here it remained until the 23d, encamped, enjoying the pure, fresh air and fragrant fields of the "Blue Grass Region" of Kentucky, the finest country the soldiers had ever seen. On the 30th of May Gen. James Nagle resigned, and Col. Griffin was permanently assigned to the command of the brigade, it being the First Brigade, Second Division, Ninth Army Corps. The brigade consisted of the Sixth and Ninth New Hampshire, Second Maryland, Forty-eighth Pennsylvania, and Seventh and Twelfth Rhode Island Regiments.

The rebel General Joseph E. Johnston, having collected an army at Jackson, Mississippi, and advanced to threaten General Grant's rear, General William T. Sherman was sent out with a force to watch and confront him. Col. Griffin's brigade was ordered to report to General Sherman, and an intrenched line was formed along Oak Ridge, guarding the roads across Big Black river. A few days later the whole corps joined General Sherman, and a second intrenched line was formed in rear of the first, extending from Hayne's and Snyder's bluffs, through Milldale, and along the high ground east of Vicksburg.

General Pemberton surrendered the city of Vicksburg to General Grant, on the 4th of July, 1863, and the same day nearly the whole of Grant's and Sherman's armies moved out to meet Johnston, encamping that night near the Big Black. Johnston, hearing of Pemberton's surrender, fell back upon Jackson, closely pursued by Sherman. The weather was extremely hot, even for that climate, the streams were dry, and the men suffered severely from the oppressive heat and the want of water. Arriving at Jackson, July 10th, the enemy seemed disposed to defend the town. An attack was immediately made by the Ninth Corps, which resulted in driving him behind his intrenchments. The place was invested and dispositions made for the final assault. Early on the morning of the 13th of July, while Colonel Griffin was in charge of the Ninth Corps, having three brigades under his command, the enemy made a sudden and furious attack, with a view to breaking the Union lines; but they were received with much coolness and steadiness by the Sixth New Hampshire, who deliberately poured upon them a most destructive fire, and they were repulsed with great slaughter. On the morning of the 16th the Sixth was sent out at two o'clock, to make a reconnoissance, when it was discovered that the rebels had evacuated the place, and our troops took possession of the town. After destroying the public property the army, on the 20th of July, commenced its march to return to Vicksburg.

On the 23d the Sixth reached its old camp at Milldale, where the men inhaled the deadly malaria of the swamps of Yazoo, whose very name signifies in the Indian tongue, the "River of Death." The effects of that climate upon the regiment and upon the whole corps were more disastrous than that of the severest battle. Nearly all were attacked with malarial fever, chills and fever, congestive chills, or some disorder incident to that climate, and large numbers of them died. On the 5th of August the regiment embarked with its brigade on board transports and proceeded up the river to Cairo, and thence by rail to Cincinnati, where it arrived on the 20th. The sickness that prevailed on board the transports was terrible, and almost universal. Almost every night, as the troops "lay up" on account of low water and the consequent danger from sand bars, a little party would be seen with lanterns, sadly making its way on shore to bury some comrade who had fallen a victim to disease. Lieut. Eli Wentworth, Regimental Quartermaster, was one of the victims, he having died at Milldale on the 18th of July, while the regiment was absent at Jackson. Halting a few days at Covington, it proceeded by rail to Nicholasville, and encamped near Camp Nelson, officers and men still suffering terribly from the effects of that southern climate. Large numbers were sent to the hospitals, and many died.

On the 9th of September the brigade was divided, and a part of the troops were sent over the Cumberland mountains to join General Burnside in East Tennessee, while the others remained in Kentucky. Col. Griffin proceeded to East Tennessee, in command of the division. The Sixth Regiment was ordered to Frankfort, to do provost duty, where it remained about two weeks, and was then sent to Russellville, to protect the inhabitants from the enemy's cavalry, who were constantly making incursions into the Southern portion of the State. While here the regiment did valuable service, scouting and chasing guerillas from the country, seizing the horses and mules of well known rebels, and using them for that purpose. Lieut. Colonel Pearson was commander of the post and Major Bixby was in command of the regiment.

Colonel Griffin having been placed in command of Camp Nelson, a large and important post, the Sixth was on the 25th of October ordered there to do provost duty in connection with other regiments. While here the regiment re-enlisted for another term of three years, or during the war. The men re-enlisted in such numbers as to secure for themselves a veteran organization of ten companies, while many of the other regiments were reduced to mere battalions of two or more companies. The regiment left Camp Nelson on the 16th of January, 1864, for New Hampshire, on a thirty days' veteran furlough, leaving the recruits and those who did not re-enlist, under the command of Captain S. G. Goodwin, assisted by Captain Crossfield, Adjutant Smith, Ass't Surgeon Noyes and Chaplain Dore. At Covington some days were spent in making out the re-enlistment papers, and on the 20th of January, two hundred and eighty-eight enlisted men, or more than three-fourths of the whole number who had served the required length of time, were re-mustered into the United States service as veterans. The regiment arrived at Keene—the place of its original rendezvous—on the 28th, where the citizens gave the men a cordial public reception and supper, and provided them with comfortable quarters in the town hall. The next day the regiment went to Concord, where it received another splendid ovation—a procession, and dinner in Phenix Hall. The men were furloughed and went to their respective homes. They re-assembled at Concord on the 29th of February, but were immediately given ten days extra, by order of the Secretary of War. On the 10th of March the men again assembled at Concord, under orders to return to the Department of the Ohio, and took cars for the west. Arriving at Manchester, Colonel Griffin received a telegraphic dispatch from the Secretary of War, ordering the regiment back to camp, to await further orders. It returned to Concord and remained there in camp until the 18th, when it proceeded, in compliance with orders, to join the Ninth Army Corps, which was then re-assembling at Annapolis, Maryland.

At Annapolis the recruits were brought forward from Camp Nelson and assigned to companies with the veterans, a thorough system of drill and discipline was instituted, new arms were furnished the men, and the regiment was brought up to a high standard, both as regarded numbers and effectiveness. Upon the re-organization of the Ninth Corps Colonel Griffin was assigned to the command of the Second Brigade, Second Division, composed of the Sixth, Ninth and Eleventh New Hampshire, Thirty-first and Thirty-second Maine, and Seventeenth Vermont Regiments, leaving the Sixth again under command of Lieut. Colonel Pearson, one of the best officers of his rank in the service.

On the 23d of April the Corps joined the Army of the Potomac, under General Grant. Passing through Washington it was reviewed by President Lincoln, from the balcony of Willard's Hotel. After two days spent at Alexandria, procuring supplies and transportation, the Corps again moved on, by way of Fairfax Court House, and joined the Army of the Potomac at the Rapidan, and on the 5th of May crossed the river at Germania Ford, and bivouacked on the field, in rear of Sedgwick's Corps, which had been engaged during the day.

At two o'clock on the morning of the 6th, the troops were in motion, and moved to attack the enemy in the direction of "Parker's Store." At daylight Griffin's brigade was formed for attack, with the Sixth deployed as skirmishers, as usual, and advanced about one mile, when the enemy was met in force, and a desultory fire kept up during the greater part of the forenoon, without any advantage being gained on either side. About eleven o'clock orders were received to move by the flank, with a view to assist in repelling an advance of the enemy on the left of the corps. The movement was made with much difficulty through a dense thicket. The line of the brigade was formed behind those of other brigades of the same corps, who were holding the ground, but making no attempt to advance. Those brigades were lying down. General Burnside himself was present, and gave the order, "Let Griffin attack." The brigade advanced promptly, in line of battle, at the command, and pressing directly over those who were lying down, charged along the whole line. The other brigades rose up and followed, shouting and cheering. The Sixth fixed bayonets and dashed upon the rebels in the most gallant manner, breaking their line and capturing seven commissioned officers and a hundred and six men. Along the whole line of this brigade the attack was successful, and the rebel line was rapidly giving way, but the line to the left did not advance, thus giving the enemy time and opportunity to turn their whole attention to this break in their line. Bringing up re-enforcements, and charging in their turn, the line was compelled to recede a short distance, but held the ground of their original lines, and intrenched for the night. The Corps was withdrawn the next day and massed in rear of the Lacy House. The loss of the regiment in this engagement was one officer and forty-four men killed and wounded.

On the 12th of May occurred the general engagement known as the battle of Spottsylvania Court House. Orders had been given to attack at four o'clock in the morning. The Ninth Corps held the extreme left of the line of the army, and was to advance to the right as well as to the front, and unite with Hancock's Second Corps. At the appointed time the corps moved off to the right in column by brigades—Griffin's brigade leading, the Sixth Regiment occupying the left center of the brigade line. Hearing the roar of Hancock's guns, Griffin made for the point whence the sound proceeded. Advancing through the pine woods, under a sharp fire, and driving the enemy's skirmishers before it, the brigade swung into line along side of the Second Corps, united with its left, and seized a favorable position on the further edge of the wood, looking out upon an open field toward the enemy's lines, and very near their works. Just at this time masses of the rebels were seen emerging from the opposite wood at double quick, in a furious charge upon the left of Hancock's Corps, which had become somewhat disorganized from the successful attack it had just previously made. Taking this whole column of rebels in front and flank, the brigade received the terrible onset with indomitable obstinacy, hurling them back in confusion, and strewing the ground with dead and wounded. A murderous and incessant fire was kept up on both sides during nearly the whole day, but that position was held until the enemy withdrew, six days later. In this brilliant movement, in which Col. Griffin won his star, and which, without doubt, saved Hancock's Corps from being routed, the Sixth Regiment bore a conspicuous part, seizing an advanced position, and holding out stubbornly, when others were disposed to quail. The loss of the regiment in this battle was sixty-eight men killed and wounded.

On the 18th, while holding this line, an advance on the enemy's lines was ordered, and the Sixth, with others, moved gallantly forward into the wood, seizing a small eminence within a few yards of the enemy's line, and holding this perilous position until withdrawn by order of General Burnside, on the afternoon of the same day. In this affair Captain S. D. Quarles was severely wounded. That night the army abandoned its position, and moved to the left, and on the 20th and 21st of May pushed on to the North Anna river, where the regiment bore its part in the engagement, but was not in the front line, being held with the reserves. On the 26th, while reconnoitering the movements and position of the enemy, Lieut. Colonel Pearson was shot through the head by a rebel rifleman. There was not a more promising young officer in the whole corps, and the regiment mourned his loss with heartfelt sorrow. He had been for some time in command of the regiment, and his loss was very severely felt. Major Bixby succeeded to the command, and soon obtained the good will of officers and men. The regiment was again engaged with its brigade, at Ptolepotamy Creek. on the 21st, driving the enemy from his position. In the several engagements from the 16th to the 31st of May, the regiment suffered a loss of three officers and thirteen men.

On the 3d of June a general engagement took place at Cold Harbor, in which the Sixth was actively engaged, near Bethesda Church—Griffin's Brigade occupying the extreme left of the line of the army. The regiment lost three officers and twenty-two men wounded, and four enlisted men killed. The next day the regiment moved to Cold Harbor, and was constantly under fire during the several days the army occupied that position. Lieut. Joseph M. Shephard was killed; Captain S. G. Goodwin, Lieuts. Orange B. Otis and John Curtin wounded.

On the night of the 12th of June the army withdrew from Cold Harbor, and moved for Petersburg, where it arrived on the afternoon of the 16th. On that night the Ninth Corps was ordered to attack at daylight next morning. Griffin's brigade was selected for this duty, supported by Curtin's brigade of the same division. General Potter commanding the division, entrusted the planning and execution of the attack to General Griffin. The troops were led under cover of darkness, to a ravine within a hundred yards of the enemy's works, and there formed for attack. So near was the position to the rebels that all orders had to be given in whispers. The leading regiments were ordered to observe the strictest silence, and to advance without firing a shot, carrying the works at the point of the bayonet. As day began to dawn the order was given to advance. The men moved quickly and noiselessly upon the rebel lines, took the enemy completely by surprise, capturing or putting to flight the whole force, and sweeping their line for a mile in extent. By this movement nearly one thousand prisoners fell into the hands of the Union troops, besides four pieces of artillery, caissons and horses, more than a thousand stand of small arms, and a quantity of ammunition. A wide breach was made in the enemy's lines, and there was nothing to prevent an advance into the city, had supports come up in time. But the other corps did not advance, and when the First and Third Divisions attacked, at three o'clock in the afternoon, the enemy was prepared to meet them, and they were repulsed with immense slaughter.

On the 18th the enemy was driven back to his inner line of fortifications, and the army took up that line from the Appomattox, running south, which it fortified with much labor and skill, and occupied with some slight changes during the succeeding ten months, extending it at different times to the south and west, until it nearly encompassed the city. The Ninth Corps occupied this part of the line until the 20th of August, and during the whole of that time the picket firing was incessant, both day and night. It was one continual engagement, and the troops were constantly under fire for nine weeks—alternately laboring on the intrenchments, or watching the enemy with musket in hand, and firing whenever there was a head to be seen in the opposing line. The loss, in consequence, was very heavy, amounting to two officers and sixteen men killed, and six officers and one hundred and two men wounded. So arduous was the duty from the 5th of May to the 20th of August, that both officers and men were so completely exhausted and worn out, from constant hardship, watching and exertion, that they could lie down and sleep soundly under the booming of cannon, the rattle of musketry and the whistle of bullets. While lying in this position, on the 15th of July, Lieut. Colonel Bixby received a wound in the shoulder, which disabled him for three months. During this time the command devolved upon Capt. Robert L. Ela.

The "Mine" in front of Petersburg was excavated by the Second Division of the Ninth Corps, the labor being performed principally by the Forty-eighth Pennsylvania. The place of the Sixth Regiment in the line of intrenchments was directly in front of and covering the mouth of the mine. On the night of the 29th of July, every thing being in readiness, the troops were put in position for the assault, and just after daylight on the morning of the 30th, the mine was sprung. The assault was led by the First Division, General Ledlie, which failed to do the work assigned to it. The Second Division, and particularly the brigade to which the Sixth belonged, did every thing that could be done; pushing on in advance of all other troops, and driving the rebels before them by hand to hand fighting. But the first hour being lost by the halting of Ledlie's division in the "crater," thus blocking the way and giving the enemy time to collect their force and concentrate their fire, it was too late to retrieve the day, despite the most strenuous exertions. The troops were withdrawn in the afternoon of the same day, by order of General Grant. In this disastrous affair the Sixth Regiment bore a brave and conspicuous part, losing Capt. Crossfield and Lieut. Upton, killed, and Captains Ela and Greenleaf, Adjutant Smith and Lieut. Hanscomb, wounded. The entire loss of the regiment was fifty-two killed and wounded.

Among those conspicuous for gallantry on this occasion was Sergeant Major Abraham Cohn, who was wounded, and who afterward received one of the medals of honor authorized by Congress to be given to meritorious soldiers. The medal was awarded by the Secretary of War, on recommendation of the brigade, division and corps commanders, approved by General Meade, and transcribed by Adjutant General Townsend, with quite a flattering letter accompanying. The medal bears the following inscription: "The Congress, to Sergeant Major Abraham Cohn, Sixth New Hampshire Vet. Vols." On the 20th of August the Ninth Corps was engaged in the battle of the Weldon Railroad, aiding in repulsing a furious attack of the enemy on the Fifth Corps. The Sixth Regiment sustained itself handsomely, losing one man killed and several wounded.

On the 30th of September the battle of Poplar Spring Church took place, in which the Ninth Corps participated. The Sixth Regiment was in the thickest of the fight, and lost in killed, wounded and missing, four officers and eighty-seven men. The field was held, and a new line of intrenchments was thrown up, in which the regiment remained until December. On the 19th of October Capt. S. D. Quarles, who had been absent on account of severe wounds received on the 18th of May, returned to the regiment, and was immediately mustered as Major.

The Ninth Corps returned to its original position in front of Petersburg, early in December, holding the right of the line of the army of the Potomac, next to the Appomattox river. Griffin's brigade occupied the left of the Corps, including Forts Sedgwick, "Hell," Davis, and Alexander Hayes, and batteries No. 24 and 25. The Sixth Regiment lay in rear of Fort Alexander Hayes, occupying this camp until the final assault on the 2d of April, 1865, which gave us Petersburg, and consequently Richmond. On the evening of the 1st of April orders were received to be prepared to unite in a general attack on the enemy's lines the next morning, at four o'clock. At ten o'clock the same evening, orders were received to attack the enemy's picket line at once, and the Sixth and other regiments of its brigade marched out and attacked that night to the left of Fort Davis, capturing eight officers and two hundred and forty-one men, and carrying their picket line for more than half a mile in extent. The 'troops were withdrawn, and transferred in the darkness to the Jerusalem plank road, and massed to the left of and near Fort Sedgwick. The ditches of the Union intrenched line were filled with water, as well as those of the enemy. Both these were to be passed, then the strong abattis of their main line was to be cut away or removed, their main ditches passed, their parapets scaled, and their works carried. The brigade was formed in column by regiments in line of battle, and the Sixth was near the head of the column. Just at daybreak, at a preconcerted signal, the column advanced to the charge. Nothing could exceed the coolness and intrepidity with which both officers and men, under a terrific fire of grape, canister and musketry, advanced to the assault. Capturing the rebel pickets as they passed, they dashed upon the enemy's main works, tearing away their abattis, sweeping over their parapets, and carrying all before them. Hundreds of prisoners were sent to the rear, and their complete line of works in front of Fort Sedgwick, with many pieces of artillery, fell into our hands. The Sixth Regiment dashed upon a small fort, near Fort Mahone, planted its colors on the parapet, captured four pieces of artillery, and turned them upon the enemy. The rebels brought up re-enforcements, and made a furious counter charge, but the works were firmly held. During the night the enemy withdrew, and the next morning at daybreak our forces entered the city without opposition. For gallant and highly meritorious conduct in this affair, Lieut. Colonel Bixby was brevetted Colonel, Major Quarles Lieut. Colonel, and Captain S. G. Goodwin Major. The regiment lost six men killed and twenty-five wounded.

From Petersburg the Sixth Regiment marched with its corps in pursuit of Lee and his army, arriving at Burks-ville on the 9th of April. On the 20th, the rebel forces having been captured or dispersed, and the war being at an end, the regiment marched to City Point, and from there sailed for Alexandria, where it arrived on the 27th. On the 1st of June Lieut. Col. Bixby was promoted to Colonel, Major Quarles to Lieut. Colonel, and Captain Robert L. Ela to Major. On the 17th of July the regiment was mustered out of the United States service, being the last remaining regiment of the Second Division, Ninth Corps, of which Gen. Griffin was then in command.

It has been said of it that "No regiment from the State and none in the army had won a prouder name, or made a more honorable record than the gallant old veteran Sixth. No regiment had seen more severe campaigning, done more or better service, or been oftener under fire. Few regiments went through the war with so little internal dissension and so much harmony among officers. Few regiments endured the hardships of the service with so much fortitude and so little grumbling; for they were men whose hearts were in the work of crushing out the rebellion. When, at various times, calls were made for the names of men to whom medals should be awarded for gallant conduct upon the field, few names were ever given, for the reason that so many had done well it was hard to designate a small number. Captains would report that almost every one of their men might be recommended, but it would be invidious to name a few."

The Sixth Regiment was actively engaged in the following battles:

Camden, North Carolina,	April 19, 1862.
Second Bull Run, Va.,	August 29, 1862.
Chantilly, Va.,	September 1, 1862.

In addition to these the regiment participated in a great number of reconnoissances and skirmishes, in which it lost no men. Many days during the campaign in the Wilderness, and for nine weeks before Petersburg, the regiment was constantly under fire and lost men almost every day, making a large aggregate. The Sixth was more often sent forward as skirmishers than any other regiment. It always did the skirmishing for its brigade, and often for its division. Company C almost always skirmished for the regiment. The regiment was particularly well drilled for this especial duty. While at Roanoke and Hatteras Islands the men were drilled and practiced every day for three months as sharpshooters, and they were considered the best shots in the Ninth Army Corps.

The Sixth Regiment arrived at Concord on the 22d of July, 1865, where it was given a formal reception by the State authorities and citizens, and the men were immediately paid off and discharged.

SEVENTH REGIMENT.

On the 2d of September, 1861, Joseph C. Abbott, of Manchester, late Adjutant General of the State, received authority directly from the War Department at Washington, to raise a regiment of infantry in New Hampshire, and uniform, arm, equip and make it ready for the field. At that time and very soon after, the State ordered the raising of four regiments of infantry, a battery, a company of sharpshooters, and a battalion of cavalry. The raising of the Seventh was regarded somewhat in the light of an individual enterprise, and was therefore surrounded by many difficulties and embarrassments, and its success was thought by some to be quite doubtful. The State authorities offered to men enlisting in this the same bounty, ten dollars, that they paid those entering other regiments, and in other ways gave to the undertaking such encouragement as they could without interfering with their own immediate plans. The headquarters of the regiment were established at Manchester, and on the 2d of October General Abbott was commissioned Lieut. Colonel—he waving his right to the position of Colonel only on condition that it should be given to some graduate of West Point. There was an understanding between the State authorities and General Abbott, from the first, that such men should be commissioned as he should designate. He nominated First Lieut. H. S. Putnam, of the United States Topographical Engineers and a native of the State, as Colonel, and Daniel Smith, of Dover, as Major, and they were commissioned by the Governor. The requisite number of men were enlisted and the organization and muster in of the regiment was completed on the 14th of December. The following were the field, staff and company officers of the regiment, and their official record, during the whole period of its service.

COLONEL HALDIMAND SUMNER PUTNAM.

Colonel Putnam was born at Cornish, Sullivan County, New Hampshire, on the 15th of October, 1835. He was a son of Hon. John L. Putnam, of that town, who was for many years previous to 1855 Judge of Probate for Sullivan County, a good farmer and highly respected citizen. Young Putnam received a good public school and academic education, and when about sixteen years old, entered the Military Academy at West Point, from which institution he graduated with high honors in July, 1857. Soon after receiving his degree, he was brevetted a Second Lieutenant in the Corps of Topographical Engineers, and at once entered the United States service, and was assigned to duty at different points on the Western frontier. His merits were soon known and appreciated, and for faithful services he was commissioned a Second Lieutenant in the Engineer Corps, and subsequently promoted to First Lieutenant. His education, ability, character and devotion to duty were such as to gain the respect of his superior officers and the confidence of the government. While on the Western frontier his marches were often arduous and his privations severe. On one journey from the western coast to the Utah country, in the winter, the troops of Lieut. Putnam's command suffered intensely from cold, and subsequently from hunger. They consumed their last ration the day before they reached the vicinity of Salt Lake City, where their necessities could be supplied. In all times of hardship and privation young Putnam exhibited great cheerfulness, courage and determination to overcome every obstacle and danger which might gather in his pathway or interfere with the performance of duty.

Early in the year 1861, when the spirit of secession began to assume the hideous form and shape of treason to the government of the country, Lieut. Putnam was summoned to Washington, and entrusted with special messages of the greatest importance, to convey to Fort Pickens. He traveled by railroad through the seceded and disaffected States, accomplished his mission, and was returning to Washington, when he was arrested, at Montgomery, Alabama, by the military authorities, and there kept in prison several days. He was finally permitted to resume his journey, and reported to the Secretary of War. He was then assigned to an important and responsible position on General McDowell's staff, where he remained until relieved to accept the Colonelcy of the Seventh Regiment, New Hampshire Volunteers. While on the staff of General McDowell Lieut. Putnam performed many arduous and important duties with a fidelity, faithfulness and skill which attracted the notice of his superiors in rank and evinced his great military ability. In the first battle of Bull Run he was in the thickest of the fight, showed great coolness and bravery, but came out unharmed.

During the first few months of the war, when treason in the regular army was the rule rather than the exception, a patriotic and faithful young officer, with the education and ability to command was appreciated, and his services were sorely needed to lead the troops from every New England state. Young Putnam had taken his position upon the side of the Union, and shown most emphatically that he hated treason and was willing, if need be, to seal his loyalty with his blood. Governor Berry offered him the command of the Seventh Regiment, which responsibility he at first hesitated about accepting, feeling that he was too young for so important a position, but on being further urged consented at last to the proposition, and was commissioned on the 15th of October, 1861. Soon after, with permission from the War Department, Colonel Putnam joined his regiment, which had been raised by Lieut. Colonel Joseph C. Abbott, at Manchester, assumed command, and entered with zeal upon the discharge of his duties, which were by no means light or easy, and soon brought his command into a high state of discipline and drill. On the 14th of January, 1862, Colonel Putnam left New Hampshire with his regiment for the seat of war. After four weeks passed in barracks in New York City, the regiment was ordered to Tortugas Island, situated on one of the Florida Keys, and was at that time the principal depot for the distribution of rations and munitions of war to the forts and military posts of the South.

Colonel Putnam immediately on his arrival there assumed command of the post, the regiment being the only troops at that point, except a few regulars. Here the regiment remained, stationed at Fort Jefferson, four months. Afterward the command was located at St. Augustine, Fla., Port Royal, S. C., and in the vicinity of Charleston. The first important action in which the Seventh Regiment was engaged was the memorable assault upon Fort Wagner. For several months preceding this engagement Colonel Putnam had been an acting Brigadier General, and was fighting with that rank at the time he was killed. His command consisted of his own and several regiments from the middle States. In the terrible assault upon Fort Wagner he displayed the most sublime courage and bravery, leading his command through a most deadly storm of shot and shell, encouraging his men by his own gallant example, until he fell mortally wounded, close up to the enemy's works.

In March, 1863, Colonel Putnam was commissioned a Captain in the United States Army. He was a strict disciplinarian, but always so dignified, candid and just in his relations and intercourse with his officers and men as to secure and retain their unbounded respect and warmest affections. In his death the army lost one of its bravest and ablest commanders, and his regiment a gallant, honored and beloved Colonel. He united with the highest military talent a spotless character and many endearing qualities of head and heart. He was among the dearest sacrifices made by the government to put down a wicked rebellion.

BRIGADIER GENERAL JOSEPH C. ABBOTT.

General Joseph C. Abbott is a son of Aaron Abbott, of Concord, Merrimack County, New Hampshire, and was born in that city on the 15th of July, 1825. He attended the public schools of Concord, and subsequently fitted for college under a private instructor and at Phillips Academy, Andover, Mass. Instead of entering college, as he had designed, he read law with Hon. L. D. Stevens, the present Mayor of Concord, for a time, and afterward with Hon. David Cross, of Manchester, and Hon. Asa Fowler, of Concord. Having a very decided taste for literary pursuits, he was employed as editor of the Manchester American for six months from April, 1851, and for the following six months was editor of the New Hampshire Statesman, published at Concord. On the 1st of May, 1852, he removed to Manchester, where he continued his residence until after the close of the war, and became permanently connected with the American as its editor and proprietor until 1857, when he disposed of his interest in the paper and the printing establishment connected therewith. In May, 1859, General Abbott became one of the editors and proprietors of the Boston Atlas and Bee, and so continued until May, 1861. He was chairman of the committee that reported the resolutions in the Whig Presidential State Convention of New Hampshire in 1852, and was a member of the Whig State Central Committee two years, the last of which he was chairman.

In July, 1855, General Abbott was appointed by the Governor and Council, Adjutant General of the State, which office he held until July, 1861, when he resigned. For several years he was an active and useful member of the New Hampshire Historical Society, and always took a lively interest in whatever related to the welfare of the State. In 1857, while Adjutant General—the State being without any effective military organization, and feeling that in time of peace we should prepare for war,—he drafted an elaborate bill providing for a thorough organization of the volunteer militia of the State, and through his activity and influence secured its enactment into a law, which is, with some slight modifications, the law of New Hampshire upon that subject still.

On the 2d day of September, 1861, General Abbott received authority from the War Department to raise a regiment of infantry in the State of New Hampshire. About that time the State authorities were organizing four regiments of infantry, a battery, a company of sharpshooters, and a battalion of cavalry, making a very heavy draft upon its available men. It was with some difficulty that General Abbott could get the Governor and Council to extend to him such assistance as was absolutely necessary to secure the success of his undertaking, absorbed as they were in other matters more immediately pressing upon them. By his indomitable perseverance, however, he succeeded in securing the requisite number of men, and established the headquarters of his regiment, which had been numbered the Seventh, at Manchester. Determined as he was that his should be the model regiment from the State, he desired that it should be commanded by a man with a thorough military education, who had seen service in the field: hence he asked only for the Lieut. Colonelcy for himself, and nominated Lieut. Haldimand S. Putnam, a graduate of West Point, a native of Cornish, in this State, and who had been in a responsible position on the staff of General McDowell since the breaking out of the rebellion, to the Governor, for Colonel. Lieut. Putnam was accordingly commissioned, and Gen. Abbott was commissioned Lieut. Colonel. Early in 1863 Colonel Putnam was placed in command of a brigade, and Lieut. Colonel Abbott commanded the Seventh Regiment. At the assault on Fort Wagner, on the 18th of July, 1863, while leading his brigade, Colonel Putnam was killed. The Seventh Regiment was in his brigade, under command of the Lieut. Colonel, and suffered a loss of two hundred and twelve officers and men, killed, wounded and missing. On the 22d of July, soon after this disastrous engagement, Lieut. Colonel Abbott was promoted to Colonel of his regiment, and commanded it in most of its severe marches and bloody battles, until the summer of 1864, when he assumed command of a brigade; after which he was nearly all of the time, until the close of the war, acting Brigadier General. He commanded a brigade at the capture of Fort Fisher, North Carolina, and was "appointed Brigadier General United States Volunteers, by brevet, for gallant services" on that occasion, to date from January 15, 1865. General Abbott was mustered out of the United States service with his regiment, returned to New Hampshire with it, and was discharged in August, 1865.

After the close of the war, General Abbott, in company with some other gentlemen, purchased valuable timber lands in North Carolina, and he removed to Wilmington and engaged actively in the land and lumber business. He was a member of the North Carolina Constitutional Convention, which assembled at Raleigh, in November, 1867, and took a leading part on committees and in debates, showing an intimate knowledge of the political affairs of the country and a deep interest in the action of his adopted State in the condition in which the war had left it. In April, 1868, he was elected to the Legislature, and in June, 1868, General Abbott was elected United States Senator from North Carolina, for the term ending March 4, 1871, in which capacity he is now serving the country.

As a political and general newspaper writer General Abbott had few superiors in New England; as a politician he was active, careful and conservative; as Adjutant General of the State, when the war first broke out, he exhibited true patriotism, the utmost energy and perseverance in raising and putting into the field, in the best possible condition for efficient service, the troops called for by the President; as a regimental and brigade commander in the field he was always cool, prudent, careful of his troops, gallant and fearless of consequences to himself, and scrupulously faithful in the discharge of every duty. As a true friend and high toned gentleman he had no superiors in New Hampshire.

LIEUT. COLONEL THOMAS ALBERT HENDERSON.

Lieut. Colonel Henderson was a son of Capt. Samuel H. Henderson, and was born at Dover, Strafford County, New Hampshire, December 1st, 1833. He completed the preparatory studies at Gilmanton Academy, and entered Bowdoin College in the fall of 1851, and graduated with distinction, at the head of his class in 1855. For the three succeeding years he was principal of Franklin Academy in Dover, where he was a popular and successful teacher. He read law in the office of Messrs. Woodman and Doe, of Dover, and finished his course at Harvard Law School in 1861, where he exhibited marked ability as a scholar and debater. He won the highest prize for a legal essay, and received the degree of LL. B. Soon after his graduation he was admitted to the Suffolk Bar of Massachusetts, with every prospect of success and eminence in his profession before him. But the country was in a war with rebels, and believing that every good citizen owed his first duty to his government he determined to enter the army. With this end in view he went to Norwich Vermont, where he remained several months, under military instruction and drill, and then in November, 1861, accepted the position of Adjutant of the Seventh Regiment, New Hampshire Volunteers.

Upon the death of Major Smith, in August, 1862, on the urgent recommendation of Colonel Putnam, Adjutant Henderson was commissioned Major. In the bloody assault upon Fort Wagner, on the 18th of July, 1863, Major Henderson acted as aid to Colonel Putnam, who was in command of a brigade, and was killed while leading a storming column, and in consequence of whose death Lieut. Colonel Abbott was promoted to Colonel, and Major Henderson to Lieut Colonel, on the 22d of the same month. He subsequently served on the staff of General Seymour, and was Provost Marshal of Florida during the campaign which resulted in the disastrous battle of Olustee. In the spring of 1864, the Seventh Regiment was transferred to Virginia, and Lieut. Colonel Henderson led his command in the battle of Drury's Bluff, where his skill and gallantry elicited the highest commendations from the commanding General. He also commanded his regiment in the engagement at Deep Bottom, near Richmond, on the 16th of August, 1864, and received a mortal wound in the hip, which severed the principal artery, from which, despite all that surgical skill and attention could do, he died in a few hours. His body was embalmed and sent home in charge of Chaplain Emerson, and was buried on the 2d of September, in Pine Hill Cemetery, in the City of Dover, amid the mourning of a large circle of relatives and friends. Thus perished, while in the faithful discharge of duty another brave and talented officer and pure and earnest patriot.

Lieut. Colonel Henderson was a man of very superior ability and fine attainments; of inflexible morality, and stainless purity of life. In the army he discharged every duty with fidelity and patriotic devotion, which with his uniform cheerfulness and kindness made him a favorite with all, of whatever rank or degree. In his death, glorious though it was, the city of his birth, the State, his regiment and the nation met with a sad loss.

MAJOR DANIEL SMITH.

Major Daniel Smith was a son of Winthrop Smith, Esq., of Durham, Strafford County, New Hampshire. He was born at that place on the 27th of January, 1823. After attendance at the public schools of his native town he attended the academies at Greenland and Pittsfield several terms. In early life he adopted the business of a land surveyor, and was eminently successful in it. In 1850 he was commissioned Lieutenant Colonel of the Twenty-fifth Regiment New Hampshire Militia, and filled many positions of honor and trust in his native town. In 1854 he removed to Dover, and from 1855 to 1860, he was a Deputy Sheriff for Strafford County, City Marshal three years, and Representative from that city in the popular branch of the New Hampshire Legislature in 1860 and 1861. For his character as a man and many desirable qualities for the position he was appointed and commissioned Major of the Seventh Regiment on the 15th of October, 1861. He went with his regiment to New York City, thence to Tortugas Islands, where he served ably and acceptably as Provost Marshal, until the regiment moved to Florida, and thence to Beaufort, South Carolina, where he was seized with fever, when he came home in a very feeble state, and died on the 26th of August, 1862, leaving a widow and four children. As a citizen, Major Smith was highly respected, and discharged all official and public duties with intelligence and fidelity. While in the army his promptness, valor, kindness to the men and uniform cheerfulness won for him the confidence, respect and affection of his fellow officers and soldiers.

The Seventh Regiment left Manchester on cars on the morning of the 14th of January, 1862. The Governor and Council were present to bid them farewell, and Governor Berry made a short address to which the officers and men responded with three hearty cheers for New Hampshire and her Governor. On arrival at New York, the morning after its departure from Manchester, the regiment was ordered into quarters at White Street Barracks, where it passed a month of comparative inactivity, relieved only by an occasional dress parade or drill in one of the city squares. On the 13th of February orders were received to embark for the Dry Tortugas. Six companies, under command of Col. Putnam, embarked on the ship S. R. Mallory, and the remaining four companies, under Lieut. Colonel Abbott, on the barque Tycoon, and both sailed the same day. The latter vessel reached Tortugas after sixteen, and the former after twenty-one days' sail. The yellow fever broke out on the Tycoon, and two men of the Seventh Regiment fell victims to the disease before reaching their destination.

Tortugas is situated on one of the Florida Keys, and at that time was the principal depot for the distribution of rations and munition of war to the forts, and military posts of the South. Colonel Putnam assumed command of the post, his regiment being the only troops at that point except a few regulars. The Seventh was stationed at Fort Jefferson, a well built fortification, nearly covering one of the small keys which rise above the coral reefs east of the Florida coast. Good quarters were arranged and other preparations made for the comfort of officers and men. Here the duty consisted mainly of garrison and fatigue duty, and drill, both as infantry and heavy artillery, in which the men made good proficiency.

On the 16th of June the regiment again embarked, and sailed for Port Royal, South Carolina, where it arrived on the 22d, and was ordered into camp at Beaufort, where it remained, doing picket and guard duty, until the 15th of September, when it was ordered to St. Augustine, Florida, on light duty, that the men might recruit—two hundred having been lost to the regiment since leaving Manchester, by death and discharge, on account of disease produced by change of habits and climate and the long confinement in bad barracks in New York, and on ship board. Major Smith was among those who died while the regiment was at Beaufort. While at St. Augustine the entire government of the town fell to the lot of the officers of the camp. The regiment remained there, except that detachments were occasionally sent on fruitless expeditions, until the 10th of May, 1863, when it was ordered to Fernandina, to relieve the Seventh Connecticut. After a month passed at that place, the regiment was ordered to Hilton Head, preparatory to an attempt to take Charleston. On the 1st of June, 1863, the regiment had received about a hundred recruits since entering the service, notwithstanding which only five hundred and thirty-three men reported for duty. The whole number borne upon the rolls, at that date, out of an aggregate, including recruits, of over eleven hundred, was seven hundred and twenty-nine officers and men, making a loss of nearly four hundred, without having been under fire.

On the 18th of June, the regiment left behind all superfluous baggage and camp equipage, and sailed from Hilton Head to Folly Island, the same night entered Stono Inlet in a heavy sea, by the aid of scows, effected a landing about midnight, marched nearly to the northern end of the island, and went into camp in the range of the enemy's guns. From this time until the 10th of July the Seventh was constantly at work on the batteries which afterward covered the landing of Strong's forces, and carried consternation into the city of Charleston.

ASSAULT ON FORT WAGNER.

On the morning of the 10th of July at daylight, the Union batteries erected on the northern point of Folly Island, opened upon the enemy's works on Morris Island, and soon, Strong's column having secured a landing, the remaining troops passed over. The Seventh New Hampshire passed over in the second column, and was at once moved to the northern part of Morris Island, relieved the force already there, threw out pickets, and when darkness came, threw up slight earth works. The first unsuccessful assault on Fort Wagner took place on the morning of the 11th, and that evening moving up still nearer to the work, the Seventh commenced what was afterward the second parallel in that siege. On the 18th of July the second assault on Fort Wagner was made. Colonel Putnam had been assigned to the command of the Second Brigade of Seymour's Division, and the command of his regiment devolved upon Lieut. Colonel Abbott. After a furious bombardment, which lasted during the entire day, Strong's brigade, just at twilight, advanced upon the works. It staggered back, leaving a few on and near the parapets; Putnam's brigade, in which was the Seventh New Hampshire, followed close upon Strong's, in the face of a most deadly fire. The attempt to take the work was, in less than an hour, seen to be a failure, and such officers and men as had gained the works were withdrawn. In this attack Colonel Putnam, Capt. Brown, and Lieutenants Baker, Cate, Bennett and Bryant were killed. Capt. Leavitt was so severely wounded that he died within three days. Capt. House died the following October, Lieuts. Davis and Worcester died in a few days after the assault, while Lieuts. Ham and Taylor, both severely wounded, recovered and returned to duty.

The loss to the regiment in this action was two hundred and twelve, killed, wounded and missing. The regiment remained on Morris Island, on duty in the trenches, on picket and on fatigue, five months, during which the weather was intensely warm.

On the 20th of December the regiment left Morris Island, and the next day landed at St. Helena and reported to Colonel Joseph R. Hawley, into whose brigade it was incorporated. Here it remained until the 4th of February, 1864, during which time it received an accession of more than three hundred recruits. On the above date the regiment, with six hundred men for duty, embarked in the expedition of Gen. Seymour to Florida, landing at Jacksonville on the 8th. It then marched with the whole force, to Sanderson, a small station about fifty miles from Jacksonville. On the 12th the Seventh Regiment marched toward Lake City, to support a mounted regiment which had been previously sent out in that direction, and which was understood to be closely pressed by the enemy. After advancing about ten miles they fell in with the cavalry scouts of the enemy, who retired after a light skirmish. After completing the purposes for which it was sent out the regiment returned to Sanderson, the same night. The next day the whole force fell back to a place called Barber's Plantation, where it remained until the 20th, when the whole of Seymour's force moved again toward Lake City. After marching about fourteen miles the enemy's skirmishers were met, and in two miles further they were found in force near Olustee. A fierce battle ensued, closing only with the approaching night, and in the defeat of the Union troops. The Seventh New Hampshire was in the advance, and was led within two hundred yards of the enemy's line, by flank and left in front. At that point they were brought into column and massed. The deployment had not commenced before the enemy opened a very severe fire of artillery and musketry. The column faltered, and at last broke in a good deal of confusion. They were rallied again, however, and during the remainder of the battle did good service. The loss of the regiment in this engagement was in the aggregate two hundred and nine killed, wounded and missing.

After the disastrous termination of the battle of Olustee, the whole force retreated to Jacksonville, where the Seventh remained until the 14th of April, almost constantly on duty, when it embarked for Gloucester Point, Va., which place it reached seven days afterward, disembarked and became a part of the army of the James, under Gen. Butler. It again embarked and landed at Bermuda Hundred on the 6th of May, and at once advanced into the country. A halt was made about seven miles from Bermuda Landing, at a place known as Ware Bottom Church, and subsequently, as a part of the Tenth Army Corps, joined in the final advance on Richmond, which after long months of tenacious holding and heroic struggling, ended in the capture of that city and the downfall of the Rebellion.

On the morning of the 9th of May the Tenth and Eighteenth Corps again advanced, reaching the Petersburg and Richmond railroad, cutting it, and passing the northern fortifications of Petersburg. The regiment bivouacked for the night on the railroad, but in the morning the enemy pressed down from Drury's Bluff, and the brigade in which was the Seventh New Hampshire, was moved forward to repel them. On account of the sudden illness of Colonel Hawley, commanding the brigade, that command devolved upon Colonel Abbott of the Seventh, leaving Lieut. Colonel Henderson in command of the regiment. Colonel Abbott sent the Seventh to the extreme left of the line upon a small elevation, with instructions to hold it as long as possible.

Very soon a brigade of the enemy advanced and attempted to charge, but were met by a fire so steady and rapid that it recoiled again. Three times it attempted to charge, and each time was driven back, and the regiment held undisputed possession of the ground until it was withdrawn with the rest of the brigade. For its conduct on that day the regiment was complimented upon the field by General Terry, commanding the division, and especial credit was awarded to Lieut. Colonel Henderson for his coolness and determination. At the close of this action the regiment returned to camp near Ware Bottom Church.

On the 12th the advance was made upon Drury's Bluff. The next day the Seventh supported the Third New Hampshire in the bloody assault made by them on the right of the enemy's works, and afterward skirmished beyond the works up to other batteries. On the next day it advanced on the main works of the enemy, investing them, and was heavily engaged all day. The next day was Sunday, and the troops were allowed to rest. On Monday they again advanced until the whole line retired, when halting from time to time to repel attacks of the enemy, it fell back upon its camp at Bermuda Hundred.

From this time until the 9th of June, the regiment was on constant and severe duty, on what was then the disturbed and threatened front at Bermuda Hundred, and nearly every day under fire. On that day the regiment marched across the Appomattox, thence toward Petersburg, being a part of the force commanded by Major General Gillmore on that day. The skirmishing was light, though the artillery fire of the enemy was considerable; but the attempt to assault the works being abandoned, the regiment returned to camp at Bermuda Hundred, that night.

On the 16th of June, the Seventh under command of Lieut. Colonel Henderson, was engaged in a very spirited fight in front of Bermuda Hundred, in which less than two brigades held in check nearly all day the main column of the enemy in its transit from the north to the south of the James. From this date followed picket and fatigue duty until August 15th, when the Seventh was in that force which crossed to Deep Bottom, first pressed upon New Market Heights, and afterward assaulted and carried a part of the enemy's works at Deep Run. The Seventh was in this assault, and was one of the last to retire from the field, which had been nearly won. Here Lieut. Colonel Henderson fell mortally wounded—an officer of the rarest qualities, admired and loved while living, and deeply mourned while dead.

On the 21st the regiment again reached camp, and rested until the 24th, when it was moved across the Appomattox, into the intrenchments before Petersburg. There it remained until September 28th, in severe duty and under almost constant fire, when it was again a part of the column which advanced north of the James. On the 29th of September, the advance was made upon New Market Heights, which were carried, and the troops continued to advance, first to Laurel Hill, then up the Darbytown Road, to within three miles of Richmond, thence Terry's division retiring, rested within intrenchments at Laurel Hill.

On the 1st of October, Terry's division again advanced toward Richmond on the Darbytown Road, and the Seventh, which had been under command of Lieut. Colonel Rollins for several days, Colonel Abbott being again in command of the brigade, occupied the left of the line of skirmishers, which advanced within two miles of the rebel capital, under a severe fire of artillery, and was one of the five regiments which had at that time, and for some months afterward, advanced nearest to Richmond. Returning again that night, the regiment rested until the 7th, when the enemy attacked furiously General Berney's right at Laurel Hill. In that attack the Seventh Regiment was in line, with no intrenchments before them, and with the rest of the Second brigade of Terry's division, withstood nearly the whole of the heavy onset of the rebel division under General Field, driving them back, after a severe fight, with heavy loss. The regiment rested until the 18th, when it was again engaged in the reconnoissance on the Darbytown Road, lasting during a day of sharp fighting. On the 27th it was in another reconnoissance on the Darbytown Road, lasting until night of the 28th, the fighting being almost entirely on the skirmish line, when it returned to camp.

The Seventh New Hampshire was one of the regiments selected for the expedition to New York City, on the occasion of the Presidential election. On the 3d of November it broke camp, marched to Deep Bottom, and took transports for Fortress Monroe, where it arrived on the evening of the 4th. The whole force took transports and arrived at New York on the 7th, and the Seventh disembarked at Fort Richmond. On the morning of the 8th they were taken to the city, lying on board the army transport, in East River, near Fulton Ferry, three days, prepared for any emergency which might arise to require their services. But they were not called upon, and on the 11th the Seventh returned to Fort Richmond, and on the 14th re-embarked, and returned to their old camp ground, near Laurel Hill, on the 17th, where the men at once commenced erecting winter quarters. In December one hundred and ninety-five men, having served their full term of enlistment, were mustered out, and one hundred and eleven recruits were received. These were most of them substitutes, who had enlisted for the high bounties then being paid, and thirty-five of them deserted during the winter.

On the 4th of January, 1865, the Seventh Regiment marched to Bermuda Hundred, and there embarked on board transports and proceeded to Fortress Monroe, and there received sealed orders to be opened off Cape Henry. The orders directed that the fleet should rendezvous twenty-five miles off Beaufort, N. C., and it was then known that the expedition was a second trial against Fort Fisher. On the morning of the 12th of January the monitors and ironclads made their way southward, followed by the frigates and gunboats, and they by thirty transports. The next morning the continuous mounds of Fort Fisher appeared in view. The transports made the beach in a smooth sea, and General Terry's force disembarked. The movements of the troops have been given in the sketches of the Third and Fourth Regiments, and need not be repeated here. The brigade in which was the Seventh was not ordered up until five o'clock in the afternoon. It did not enter the fort until dark, and was not brought fairly into action until ten o'clock. At that hour, the regiment commanded by Lieut. Colonel Rollins, led the assault on the sea angle of the fort, and half an hour later planted its colors on the bastion of the surrendered work. While innumerable rockets from the fleet lighted up the sky to the eastward, cheer on cheer went up from the victorious troops within the fort. The Seventh, with one other regiment, formed in line southward of the fort, and pressed on toward battery Buchanan, which, with about a thousand prisoners, soon surrendered, and the whole of the immense fortifications, which had been considered impregnable, fell into the possession of the Union army.

After the conquest of Fort Fisher the Seventh was occupied in strengthening the works in front of Wilmington, in making reconnoissances, and in picket duty, until the 19th of February, when the enemy commenced retiring and Terry to pursue. Reaching Wilmington on the 22d, the enemy, dispirited and disheartened, was still followed ten miles further, to a place called Northeast Ferry. The regiment, with the rest of its brigade, was then ordered back to Wilmington, and assigned to the garrison of that place. Early in June it was sent to Goldsborough, where it remained until ordered to be discharged. The Regiment was mustered out of the United States service on the 20th of July. At Manchester they were received by the citizens with many demonstrations of respect and given a warm welcome by a large concourse of people. At Concord an escort and refreshments awaited them, and Governor Smyth, on behalf of the State, addressed the regiment, thanking them for the good service they had performed and the honor they had won. Three hundred and twenty men and twenty-two officers returned. Of these less than one hundred were among those who left the State with the regiment in January, 1862. Of the original field and staff only one remained. The first colonel and the second lieutenant colonel had fallen in battle.

EIGHTH REGIMENT.

The Eighth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry was raised simultaneously with the Sixth and Seventh, and the men who enlisted to make up its quota were paid the same bounty, ten dollars, by the State as those in the five preceding ones had been paid. The rendezvous was established at Manchester. Hawkes Fearing, jr., was commissioned Colonel of this regiment on the 24th of September, 1861. The companies went into camp as fast as they were filled up, on the Fair Ground north of the City. The encampment was named "Camp Currier," in compliment to Hon. Moody Currier, of Manchester, one of the members of the Governor's Council, who had in various ways, officially and individually, shown his patriotism in aiding and encouraging enlistments for the war. The organization was completed and the regiment mustered into the United States service on the 23d of December, 1861. COLONEL HAWKES FEARING, JR.

When the war of the rebellion broke out, in April, 1861, Colonel Fearing was engaged in a considerable mercantile business at Manchester. Early in September, 1861, he was tendered the command of the Eighth New Hampshire Regiment Volunteer Infantry, which he accepted, and was commissioned by the Governor on the 24th of that month. He organized his regiment at Manchester, took it to the field, and remained with it, either in immediate command of the regiment or the brigade of which it formed a part, during the whole three years term of its enlistment, except when detailed for temporary duty elsewhere. For some time previous and at the assault on Port Hudson, on the 27th of May, 1863, Colonel Fearing was in command of the brigade, on which occasion he exhibited coolness and bravery, and handled his command, which made a most gallant charge, with much skill. Had his brigade been supported by other troops, Port Hudson would undoubtedly have fallen into the hands of the Union army at that time, instead of five or six weeks later. While the Eighth Regiment was at Natchez, Miss., during the fall and winter of 1864, Colonel Fearing was on duty as chief of staff at General Brayman's headquarters. The term of service of the regiment expired on the 23d of December, 1864, shortly after which the original members, who had not re-enlisted, and a majority of the officers, under the command of Colonel Fearing, returned to New Hampshire and were discharged, Colonel Fearing being mustered out on the 18th of January, 1865. He was an intelligent, active, faithful and popular officer, and enjoyed the respect and confidence of soldiers, and officers of every grade. After being discharged from the service Colonel Fearing returned to mercantile pursuits, and is interested in an establishment at Manchester, and another in Massachusetts.

LIEUT. COLONEL OLIVER WOODBURY LULL.

Lieut. Colonel Lull, of the Eighth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers, was another in the long list of noble and brave men from the State who fell while gallantly fighting to uphold the stars and stripes. He was born in Weare, Hillsborough County, New Hampshire, on the 14th of January, 1826. He attended the public schools of his native town, at intervals, until eighteen years of age, when in 1844, he removed to Manchester, entered the high school in that city, and passed through a thorough academic course of study. On account of limited means he was obliged to abandon his most fond hopes of a collegiate course. Soon after leaving the Manchester high school he engaged for a time in teaching at Framingham, Mass., and subsequently commenced reading law there, and completed the course in the office of Hon. David Cross, of Manchester. He was admitted to the bar of Hillsborough County, in May, 1851, and soon after removed to Milford, where he established himself in the practice of his profession, and for his perseverance and industry was rewarded with a good business.

Lieut. Colonel Lull had always had considerable taste for military duty, and manifested quite an interest in the Volunteer Militia of the State. He became a member of the Governor's Horse Guards, soon after its organization, and in January, 1861, was elected one of its Lieutenants. When the war broke out he aided in various ways the enlistment of men for the different regiments, and finally on the 1st of October, 1861, was commissioned Lieutenant Colonel of the Eighth Regiment, and at once entered upon the duty of recruiting and organizing that regiment, and went with it to the field. To speak particularly of his service while with that regiment, would be but a repetition of its history. He was always faithful to his duty and to his country, fearless of consequences to himself, cool and gallant in battle, and considerate of his men in field and camp, and commanded their highest respect. In the actions of Bisland, Georgia Landing, Labadieville and Opelousas, he displayed great courage and heroism.

At the time of the terrible assault upon the fortifications of Port Hudson, on the 27th of May, 1863, Lieut. Colonel Lull was temporarily serving on the staff of General Emery, but Colonel Fearing being in charge of a brigade, he voluntarily returned and took command of his own men. The Eighth Regiment was among the forces at the head of the column when the advance was ordered, and with unequalled heroism the brave men charged directly upon the rebel forces. The conflict was desperate, but at length the enemy began to retreat with heavy loss. Lieut. Colonel Lull was constantly at the head of his command, and the fourth rebel line had just been passed, when in the act of cheering his men he fell pierced with a rebel rifle ball. The wound though very severe was not instantly fatal. He was immediately carried to the rear where after a few hours of intense suffering he expired. His body was carried to New Orleans and placed in a receiving tomb, and there remained until the following autumn, when it was brought home to Milford for burial. The funeral services were held November 17th, in the church where the deceased was accustomed to worship, the building being filled to its utmost capacity with sorrowing kindred and friends. A detachment of the Governor's Horse Guards was present and performed military honors. Hon. David Cross, of Manchester, made an address, relating many incidents in the life of the deceased. The remains were deposited in the village cemetery, and his grave will long be remembered and honored as that of a man who nobly sacrificed his life for his country.

While in the service Lieut. Colonel Lull discharged many important and responsible duties. For a time he served upon the staff of General Weitzel, and afterward for several months on that of General Emery, in both of which positions he won the highest respect and confidence of his superior officers. Before leaving the State he was presented by his friends with a valuable horse and sword as testimonials of their regard. In a letter to his wife Lieut. Colonel Lull wrote: "I wish much to see you all, but I cannot leave my command. There is a great work before us, and I have no desire to go from the field until it is accomplished. If my life is spared till the rebellion is overcome, how much happier you will be to think that in my humble way I was instrumental in restoring the country to peace and prosperity." On the morning preceding his death, before the battle opened, he wrote in his diary: "In one hour we commence the storming of Port Hudson. Many of us will not see another day. If I shall be one of that number, I will have done my duty."

The Eighth Regiment left Camp Currier, Manchester, on the 24th of January, 1862, in the midst of a driving snow storm, for Fort Independence, Boston Harbor. They were hospitably received and entertained at Faneuil Hall, Boston, by the authorities of the city, and arrived at Fort Independence the next day. The regiment remained there three weeks, drilling and waiting transportation, when on the 15th of February six companies, under command of Col. Fearing, embarked on the ship E. Wilder Farley, for Ship Island, Mississippi, the rendezvous of General Butler's expedition, and were followed a few days after by the four remaining companies, under command of Lieut. Colonel Lull, on the ship Eliza and Ella. After a long and tedious voyage the Farley arrived at Ship Island on the 15th, and the Eliza and Ella on the 27th of March.

Forts Jackson and St. Philip having fallen before the irresistible valor of the navy, under the gallant Farragut, it remained for the army to follow up and complete the victory, by the occupation of New Orleans. The large part of General Butler's force was conveyed from Ship Island up the Mississippi river; the remainder were to approach the city by way of Lake Ponchartrain. The Eighth New Hampshire were of this latter force, and four companies of the regiment were the first to seize and occupy Forts Wood and Pike, by which the entrance to the Lake was defended—the rebels retreating precipitately on the approach of the expedition.

The summer of 1862 was spent by the regiment at Camp Parapet, Louisiana, performing the usual routine of camp duty. The location was very malarious and unhealthy, from which the regiment suffered severely, its ranks being decimated by disease and death. In October the Eighth formed a part of General Weitzel's expedition to expel the rebels from the occupation of the district of Lafourche—one of the most productive and wealthy sections of Louisiana. The troops were conveyed up the Mississippi on steamers, and landed at Donaldsonville, at the head of Bayou Lafourche. From this Point the Union troops moved down the Bayou, the Eighth with a squadron of cavalry and two pieces of artillery, marching on the right bank of the stream, the remainder of the troops upon the left. With the exception of a night skirmish between the pickets of the Eighth and a scouting party of rebel cavalry, no opposition was met with, until a little beyond the village of Labadieville, the enemy were discovered in force under General Morton, advantageously posted on both sides of the Bayou, sheltered by a hedge and ditch. Companies E and F were deployed as skirmishers, to ascertain the position of the enemy. Soon the sharp crack of their rifles told that they had discovered them, and that the action had commenced. Almost at the first fire the gallant Captain Warren was killed—the first man in the regiment to fall in action. General Weitzel threw reinforcements across the Bayou, and the line advanced upon the enemy, the Eighth in the van. A short but sharp conflict ensued, ending in a charge which scattered the rebels in confusion, many being killed and wounded, and about three hundred taken prisoners, and one piece of artillery and a large number of small arms captured. Being in the advance, and the first to charge the enemy's batteries, the Eighth suffered more severely than all the other regiments engaged, losing sixteen killed and forty-six wounded—among the former being the brave Captain Killiher, who fell at the head of his men in the charge. No further opposition was encountered, the enemy having evacuated the Laroufche country and crossed over Berwick Bay into Attakapas.

The next day but one after this affair, the Eighth, with a squadron of cavalry and a section of artillery, were sent under command of Colonel Fearing to take possession of New Orleans and Opelousas Railway. At Tigersville, Louisiana, the expedition captured an immense quantity of sugar which the rebels had been obliged to abandon upon the advance of the Union forces. On reconnoitering the railroad it was found that a bridge about one hundred and twenty feet long, across Bayou Bœuf, had been destroyed, while a mile of the track was covered with the ruins of engines and cars, burned to prevent their falling into the hands of the Union troops. Yankee skill and ingenuity were called into requisition, a detail was made from the regiment, the bridge rebuilt, the track relaid, an engine put in running order, and in one week trains were passing over the road, bringing stores and ammunition from New Orleans, ninety-three miles distant.

During the winter of 1862-63 Lieut. Colonel Lull was detached as Provost Judge of the Parish of Lafourche, with Company B as provost guard. In the spring of 1863 the regiment took part in General Banks' demonstration against Port Hudson, at the termination of which the troops were rapidly conveyed to Brasher City, and the campaign through central Louisiana, which terminated in the investment and capture of Port Hudson, commenced. The enemy, under General Dick Taylor, were first encountered in force, at Camp Bisland, on Bayou Teche, intrenched behind breastworks, mounting heavy guns and aided by an iron-clad gunboat on the Bayou. On the 13th and 15th of April the battle of Camp Bisland was fought, resulting in the hasty retreat of the rebels, a large number of whom were killed and wounded; the capture of ten pieces of artillery, two colors, and two thousand prisoners, and the destruction of the gunboat and three transports. In this engagement the regiment was advanced within two hundred yards of the works, sheltered by a shallow ditch from the ceaseless storm of ball, grape and shell that filled the air, not only from the enemy's works in front, but from the Union batteries in the rear. So close was the fire that the bullets constantly struck the bayonets that projected above the edge of the ditch, and the lance that ornamented the flag-staff was carried away by a fragment of shell. The loss of the regiment in this encounter was only two killed and nine wounded—their close proximity to the enemy and the shelter of the ditch saving the men from the effects of the terrible fire.

In the march of two hundred and thirty miles to Alexandria, Louisiana, the regiment suffered severely from the heat, dust, and want of water, but bore these hardships so cheerfully as to elicit frequent commendations from the commanding general. When General Banks transferred his forces from Red River to the east bank of the Mississippi, preparatory to the attack on Port Hudson, the Eighth regiment was among the first to arrive at and invest that celebrated strong-hold.

PORT HUDSON.

Port Hudson proper is merely a landing at the foot of the bluff, on the top of which were a few houses and a church. This bluff, like many others along the river, had been fortified with an extensive earthwork, encircling it from the river above to the river below; and for a quarter of a mile in front the heavy forest trees had been felled and made into an almost impenetrable abattis, or slashing, at the same time affording free range for the guns of the enemy. On the top of the bluff were the batteries commanding the river, to hold which scores of similar though not so extensive works had been erected all along from Vicksburg to Port Hudson, and into the latter had been driven by the Union army about seven thousand rebels, under command of General Gardner. The capture of these and the works they held was the object aimed at. The number of the besieging army was said to be about twenty-two thousand effective men, with a hundred and fifty pieces of artillery. The plan of attack was to open with the artillery at daylight, and for the infantry to advance at the same time and drive the outlying rebels inside their works, and enter them, if possible. The attacking party was formed in five lines, with distances of thirty paces, and the starting point a mile and a half from the works—the rebels lying in the woods between.

Colonel Fearing was in command of the Second Brigade, Third Division, Nineteenth Army Corps, and the Eighth Regiment formed a part of his brigade. Lieut. Colonel Lull had returned to the regiment from his long detail on staff duty. The night before the assault, made on the 27th of May, 1863, the regiment bivouacked in the woods within rifle-shot of the concealed but watchful enemy. At dawn, after a hasty breakfast, ammunition was distributed and all preparations for the assault made. The Eighth was posted on the right center, in the second line of battle. The order to advance was given, the enemy soon encountered, and fighting commenced. Shot and shell, grape and canister, crashed through the woods from the batteries on either side, and the rebels, from behind stumps and trees, replied to the volleys of musketry delivered by the Union advancing lines. The first line was soon broken and scattered by the withering fire of the enemy, and Colonel Fearing's brigade was ordered to charge. With a wild yell the line swept forward as fast as possible over the bodies of the fallen—the Eighth New Hampshire and the Fourth Wisconsin moving shoulder to shoulder, driving the rebels through the woods, over their outer works, across the slashing and broken ground in front of the elaborate defenses of Port Hudson; many of the men advancing into the ditch, planting the regimental colors on the very walls, and slaughtering the rebel gunners as they endeavored to work their pieces. Supports failed to come up, and the most advanced troops were compelled to withdraw to a more sheltered position, whence all day they poured such a deadly fire on the works that the guns were silenced, and all who attempted to near them were cut down the instant they appeared. It was a most gallant charge, though it did not accomplish all that was desired, and the success gained was achieved with fearful loss. The Eighth suffered more than any other regiment in the army; the Fourth Wisconsin, which fought next the Eighth in line, being next in order. The slaughter was terrific, much of the fighting being hand to hand. The Tenth Arkansas, rebel regiment, which occupied the position in front of the New Hampshire Eighth, was almost annihilated. Lieut Colonel Lull fell mortally wounded, by a minnie ball, early in the charge, while cheering on his men. His loss was deeply deplored. Captain Flanders and Lieutenants Jones and Langley were wounded. All of the color guard, excepting a single corporal, were killed or wounded; but the gallant survivor kept fast hold of his flag, and planted it triumphantly on the outer slope of the works, where it remained till night, riddled with grape, canister and bullets. The number taken into the fight was two hundred and ninety-eight, and of these one hundred and twenty-four were killed or wounded.

From this time followed the usual events of a siege. A constant fire was kept up between the pickets, and many men were killed on both sides. Lieut. Geo. W. Thompson was killed while in the rifle pits, two days after the assault. The regimental return for May showed three hundred and seventeen men present for duty.

On the 12th of June the following order was issued:

HEADQUARTERS THIRD DIVISION, }
Before Port Hudson, June 12th, 1863. }

GENERAL ORDERS: No. 64.

COLUMN OF ATTACK.

Eighth New Hampshire, Fourth Wisconsin, as skirmishers, intervals two paces.

Five companies, Fourth Massachusetts and One Hundred and Tenth New York, with hand grenades.

Four companies from Third brigade, with 400 cotton bags.

Third Brigade.

Second Brigade.

First Brigade.

50 Pioneers, to level parapet for artillery.

Nims' Battery.

1. The hand grenade men carry their pieces on their backs, and carry each one grenade. They march three paces in rear of their line of skirmishers. Having thrown their grenades they go on as skirmishers.

2. The cotton-bag bearers march at the head of column, two hundred paces in rear of skirmishers. They fill the ditch to company front. Having deposited the bags, they take arms, and march at the head of column.

3. The whole movement will be in quick time; no double-quick; but in case the skirmishers encounter batteries which they can take by a double-quick advance, they will move in that step.

4. The skirmishers will clamber upon the parapet, followed by the hand grenades, which will be thrown over into the works as soon as the skirmishers are on the outer slope of the parapets. The skirmishers will then rush in and gain ground forward, fighting, lying down, etc., according to circumstances.

5. As soon as the column is within the works, each brigade will form line of battle, and lie down until the artillery is brought up, unless circumstances should necessitate different orders.

6. Each regimental commander will read these instructions to his command, and will carefully explain to his own troops their particular duties.

7. Each regiment, when forming in the night, will move silently, the officers speaking in a low tone.

8. The men will carry two days' rations of hard bread in their haversacks, forty rounds of ammunition in their cartridge-boxes, and twenty rounds in their pockets. The knapsacks will be left in camp under a guard of convalescents.

By command of Brigadier General Paine,

GEORGE W. DURGIN, A. A. A. G.

Official: E. B. BELL, A. A. A. G.

The storming column was formed in accordance with the foregoing order, behind a hedge, about eight hundred yards from the works, and separated from them by an uneven open field. When within eighty yards of the works sheets of flame ran around the parapet, and the cannon poured in their double shotted charges of canister cutting through the ranks of the column like hail in a field of ripe wheat. Yet they advanced at a double-quick until the rebels, thinking the day lost, began to retire from their guns. Cheered by the hope of victory the New Hampshire Eighth and Fourth Wisconsin scaled the parapets, and had the supports come up promptly the place would have been captured. Many of these, however, were nine months men, and they halted, wavered, and finally fell back, leaving the handful of brave men to the mercy of the besieged, who now rallied and captured all who had entered the work, and poured a murderous fire into the remnant remaining in front, who escaped, if they escaped at all, by crawling back into the ditches and ravines. General Paine was shot through the leg early in the action, and could not be moved from the field till after dark. To his wound may perhaps in a great measure be attributed the failure of the attack. The Eighth was commanded by Captain Barrett. It was reported to have entered the fight with two hundred and seventeen men, and to have lost one hundred and twenty-two. Capt. J. M. Stanyan was wounded and taken prisoner. Lieuts. Wallace, Hosley and Newell were missing. Captain Flanders and Lieuts. Gannon, Locke, Prescott, and O'Grady, were all wounded. No flag of truce was allowed by the rebels for three days, and nothing could be known of the condition of the wounded lying between the lines. The rebels refused to allow the Union stretcher-bearers to go upon the field, and scores of poor fellows perished of thirst, under the scorching sun, who might have been saved. On the 17th the stench from the putrefying corpses had become so intolerable to the enemy that they raised a white flag, and proposed to pick up the Union dead and wounded and deliver them at a given point. This was accepted, and one hundred and thirteen dead and one wounded were brought in, most of them so discolored as to be unrecognizable.

The siege was continued, the Union works being constantly advanced, until the 4th of July, when Vicksburg surrendered. Dispatches were received from General Grant, announcing the grand result at the headquarters of General Banks, on the morning of the 7th, and soon the joyful news was communicated to every regiment, battalion and detachment in the army. General Banks issued a general order, directing a salute of one hundred shotted guns to be fired from each battery, and ordering all the regimental bands to assemble at his headquarters at noon. The salutes were fired and two hundred instruments performed some of our most stirring melodies, and there were other demonstrations of joy, which the rebels at Port Hudson did not understand. They soon, however, learned of the surrender of Vicksburg through the Union troops, doubting the truth of which General Gardner the next day sent a flag of truce to ascertain if the report was indeed true. General Banks returned official copies of General Grant's dispatches, upon receipt of which the rebel commander, Gardner, again sent out to know upon what terms General Banks would receive his surrender. Terms were arranged and Port Hudson was surrendered on the 9th of July. The scenes and ceremonies attending the surrender and transfer of the second great strategic point on our vast continental river to its rightful owners, were most imposing. From morning till high noon was seen the grand and triumphal march of the Union victorious columns, treading with joyous steps the paths to that famous place. In the column the New Hampshire Eighth was assigned to a position of honor, in recognition of the gallant service it had performed in the siege, and was further complimented by assignment to a camping ground on that high bluff midway of the river front, and directly under the stars and stripes it had done so much to defend. The rebel General Gardner surrendered his sword to General Andrews; unwilling hands lowered the banner of secession; a squad of sailors from the fleet drew up to the same point the glorious stars and stripes; salutes and cheers were given with a will, and the Mississippi river, from its mouth to its source, was free!

On the 22d of August the Eighth marched back to Baton Rouge. On the way two of the men were gobbled up by the rebel cavalry, they having stopped to bring along a disabled wagon. The regiment remained in camp north of the capital city of Louisiana, where it continued until the 2d of September, when it embarked on transports and sailed with an expedition to Sabine Pass, Texas, at the mouth of the Sabine river. The pass was defended by heavy guns, by which was disabled the two gunboats Sachem and Clifton, and the rebels made prisoners of all on board, numbering about one hundred and eighty men. After some further mishaps the object of the expedition was abandoned and it returned to New Orleans. About the middle of September the Eighth returned to Camp Bisland—the old battle ground of the 13th of April.

Colonel Fearing was absent with two or three officers for the purpose of bringing on conscripts, and Captain Flanders, who had been promoted to Lieut. Colonel, was in command of the regiment. Early in October they moved to Opelousas; and in December were ordered to Franklin, where the regiment was mounted and the name of the organization changed to the Second New Hampshire Cavalry. They were armed with sabers, carbines and revolvers, and drilled in the ordinary cavalry tactics. During the month Colonel Fearing returned with upward of three hundred and fifty recruits for the regiment. On the 4th of January, 1864, two hundred and nineteen of the old men re-enlisted, and without the usual thirty days' furlough they were ordered at once into the field.

At the commencement of the Red River campaign, the Eighth, with the rest of the cavalry division—about fifteen thousand men—marched from New Orleans to Alexandria—three hundred and eighty miles—where they joined General A. J. Smith's forces, who had ascended the river. The Second New Hampshire Cavalry, as the regiment was now designated, was brigaded with five regiments under Colonel Davis. From Alexandria the cavalry pushed the enemy's rear-guard closely, having quite a skirmish at Natchitoches, where the regiment charged through the streets of the town, killing and capturing a number of the enemy.

On the 8th of April the cavalry came unexpectedly upon the enemy at Sabine Cross Roads, where the Second New Hampshire Cavalry at once charged on a brigade and put them to flight. This movement unmasked two divisions of rebel infantry, but they, apparently bewildered by the very audacity of the movement, allowed the regiment to escape unmolested. In the action which followed, a part of the regiment was dismounted and deployed as skirmishers in front of the infantry. These were nearly all captured, numbering forty-seven men—together with Captain Dana W. King, whose horse was shot in the charge—and were carried to the famous prison pen at Tyler, Texas, where they suffered the common lot of Union prisoners of war for several months. A disastrous battle followed, after which the regiment covered the retreat of the infantry, almost continually skirmishing with the enemy. On the march from Alexandria to Morganzia, the regiment saw its hardest experience. Skirmishing by day and marching by night to reach the army whose retreat it was following, without sleep or rest, both men and horses were well nigh exhausted. In one of the numerous skirmishes with the rebels, Lieut. Cobbs, of Company B, was captured, dismounted and disarmed; but before he could be taken to the rear, the regiment made a counter charge to recapture him. Seeing that he was about to be lost to them, a rebel officer shot him with his own pistol. His body fell into the hands of his regiment, and was buried on the banks of the Red river.

At Yellow Bayou, on the 17th of May, the brigade was attacked by about six thousand of the enemy, and were nearly surrounded. They succeeded in cutting their way out by presenting a bold front, and by undaunted courage. At Bayou de Glace, where they stopped to build a bridge over the Atchafalaya river, they were fiercely attacked by the enemy, under General

Dick Taylor. The enemy were resolutely met and quickly routed, losing two hundred and fifty prisoners and two pieces of artillery, and did not afterward disturb the Union army on its march. During the whole of the campaign the Second New Hampshire Cavalry lost ninety-six men killed, wounded and missing. Lieuts. Bickford, Newhall and Haskins were wounded in the last two fights.

After arriving at Morganzia the regiment was ordered to New Orleans, to proceed on its veteran furlough. The re-enlisted men started up the Mississippi on the 11th, and arrived at Concord on the 23d of July, where they met with a warm reception. They remained at home until the 29th of August, when they started for Louisiana, and joined their comrades at Camp Parapet, and were soon ordered to Natchez, Miss., where they remained during the fall, doing picket and garrison duty. While stationed here a detachment of the regiment, under command of Major Connolly, participated in an expedition into Louisiana, capturing large quantities of stores and provisions, and bringing in many horses and mules.

Late in the fall the regiment was ordered into Fort McPherson—an extensive earth-work, commanding the city and its approaches. Here the men constructed comfortable winter quarters, cook-houses, etc., out of the debris of houses pulled down to give range to the guns; and the regiment had time for putting their clothing and equipments in good order, and soon presented so fine an appearance as to elicit the high commendations of inspecting officers.

The time of service of the regiment expired on the 23d of December, 1864, shortly after which the non-veterans, and a majority of the officers, under command of Colonel Fearing, were ordered home to be mustered out of service. They reached Concord early in January, 1865, were handsomely welcomed by the State authorities, mustered out, paid, and the regimental organization of the Eighth New Hampshire Volunteers ceased to exist.

VETERAN BATTALION.

At the expiration of the original term of the Eighth Regiment, there remained in service three hundred and five veteran volunteers, and recruits joined subsequent to the original muster-in of the regiment. These, under regulation of the War Department, were organized into three companies of the maximum strength, and designated the "Veteran Battalion, Eighth New Hampshire Volunteers." Though there was no regimental organization, Surgeon Andrew J. Thompson was retained in the service to attend to the health of the battalion. The command dates its organization from January 1st, 1865. Captain Landers assumed command of the battalion by virtue of superiority of rank.

On the 9th of January the battalion was ordered to Vidalia, on the Louisiana shore, directly opposite Natchez. The post was commanded by Brigadier General M. Brayman—Lieut. Marshall, of the Veteran Battalion, being his adjutant general. The defenses of Vidalia consisted of a square redoubt, with bastions at the inland angles, inclosing the court house and jail of the parish, which were used for officers' quarters and for the storage of quartermaster's and ordnance stores. The work mounted four ten pounder rifles and two howitzers, and was garrisoned by the Veteran Battalion.

a squadron of the New Jersey Cavalry, and a section of artillery. All the territory in federal possession was included in a picket line two miles in length, curving in a semi-circle from the river to the river again. In the stream, a little above the fort, lay the huge iron-clad Benton, whose hundred-pounders and eleven-inch Dahlgrens commanded a wide sweep of country in rear of the post. The nearest post of the enemy was at Harrisonburg, about forty miles distant, with an outpost at Trinity, twenty-five miles from Vidalia. The country between was a sort of "debatable ground," being raided over by either party in turn. The Union forces would sweep the rebel plantations along Black river of all the horses, mules and corn that could be found, while small parties of the enemy would make midnight forays upon the government lessees, most of whom were northern men, who trusting to their contiguity to the Federal lines for protection, had engaged in cotton-planting around Vidalia. The rebel jay-hawkers would plunder them and shoot them down remorselessly. On one occasion a party of sixty of these rebel marauders dashed into a plantation within plain sight of the post, upon which was a picket of a sergeant and six men of the Veteran Battalion. The sergeant drew up his little force in line of battle across the road, and as the enemy came charging down, received them with a volley from his six rifles, which sent them precipitately to the "right about." Plunder and not fighting being their object, they retreated at the slightest show of resistance. These raids became quite frequent during the month of February, but the enemy never ventured to attack the post.

It being ascertained that most of the raiding and plundering about Vidalia was done by deserters from the rebel army east of the Mississippi, who were living at their homes along Black river, and subsisting upon the spoils of their guerilla warfare, General Brayman decided to send out a party to kill or capture them if possible; or at any rate to seize their horses and mules, which would deprive them of the means of carrying on their depredations. By his order, on the 4th of February, Captain James R. Newell, of Company C, with a party of fifteen men, mounted for the occasion, started for Black river. They were accompanied by four scouts, Union men of the south, who, hunted like wild beasts, their crops and buildings burned, and their wives and children turned houseless into the woods to starve, had entered the Union service. These scouts were clad in "rebel gray," armed to the teeth; and, being rendered desperate by their grievances, had sworn never to be taken alive, all preparations having been made, the party started from Vidalia before daylight, and striking across the fields, the little cavalcade entered the wooded swamp which skirts the strip of cultivated land along the river, guided only by the compass, and marks upon trees—unnoticeable by ordinary observers, but easily seen and recognized by the keen-eyed scouts. The party at last reached Black river where it empties into Red river, and commenced operations, and, swooping down upon the haunts of the guerillas, captured their horses and horse equipments; but the guerillas themselves escaped by plunging into the swamp. Two or three of these rebel rendezvous were broken up in as many days, when one of the scouts, who, in his rebel gray had ridden out toward Harrisonburg, returned with the intelligence that their movements were known to the rebel commander, and that a force of about three hundred rebel cavalry were in hot pursuit. So, leaving Black river, Captain Newell struck into the swamp once more, driving before the party the captured stock, and heading for Vidalia. A furious rain-storm set in, and soon the rising water warned them that an overflow of the Mis-

Mississippi was at hand, and that their only safety lay in reaching higher ground. The water rose rapidly until it reached the men's stirrups; the enemy behind, the flood for miles before and around them, they splashed on in silence through the gloomy forest, always dark in the sunniest days, now doubly so that the sky was overcast and the air filled with sheets of driving rain. It was at this time that the scouts' knowledge of the country saved the whole party. Guided by them they arrived at nightfall on a ridge of land in the midst of the swamps, ten miles from any clearing or human habitation. Here they bivouacked, and passed a most miserable and uncomfortable night, in a pelting rain, without shelter, and almost entirely destitute of food for man or horse. The water continued to rise through the next day, but toward night the rain slackened, and Captain Newell, with one of the scouts, set out to discover some means of escape from the watery blockade. They pushed out into the water, which grew deeper and deeper until the horses had to swim. Finally the scout's horse gave out, sank and was drowned, while he took to a log. Captain Newell's horse began to show signs of failing strength, when he threw off his saber, pistol, boots and overcoat, and plunging into the water seized his horse's mane, and after an hour's swimming the noble animal landed him again upon the ridge, when he fell insensible to the ground—the blood rushing from his nostrils from the violence of his exertions. He was taken to the fire and resuscitated. The darkness rendered a search for the scout that night impracticable. At daylight next morning Captain Newell and two men started out and found him a mile and a half from the ridge, clinging to the log almost lifeless, from cold and exhaustion. He was rescued and carried to the ridge, where he was taken care of and restored. The men, being upon the verge of starvation, killed a horse and a mule, and feasted upon steaks and cutlets, seasoned with gunpowder in lieu of salt. After another day passed on the ridge, the swamp being still impassable, it was determined to make a bold push for the Union lines by the nearest road, which after some sharp practice and amusing adventures they reached on the 10th, having been absent six days.

On the 6th of March the battalion returned to Natchez, where they were engaged in provost duty. They soon became the favorites of the commanding general, J. W. Davidson, an old regular army officer, through whose exertions they were fitted out with new uniforms, shoulder scales, etc., in which the battalion presented quite a holiday appearance. During the month of March a detachment from the battalion proceeded by steamboat to Gaines' Landing, about twenty-five miles up the river from whence they marched into the interior and captured a rebel depot of supplies and a few prisoners. Lieut. George B. Johnson was detailed as assistant provost marshal of Natchez, and Lieut. John J. Nolan to command the military prison.

On the reception of the news of the surrender of Lee's army and the capture of Richmond, a general illumination of the city and a torch-light procession were ordered by the provost marshal. Both were grand, and the right of the column was assigned to the Veteran Battalion. In May Surgeon A. J. Thompson was assigned to duty as surgeon in charge of the district, which position he occupied until the command was mustered out. Captain James H. Landers was detached as assistant commissary of musters, leaving Captain James R. Newell in command of the battalion. On the 5th of June Lieut. Charles A. Bowen, of Company B, formerly regimental quartermaster of the old organization, was detached as post quartermaster at Natchez, having charge of several million dollars worth of property of every description, from a steamboat to a mule shoe. About this time over ninety enlisted men of the battalion were employed upon various kinds of detached service, as clerks, orderlies, &c., a fact which speaks well for the trustworthiness of the rank and file. On the 12th of August Lieut. James H. Marshall was detached as Acting Assistant Adjutant General upon the staff of Major General H. W. Slocum, commanding the Department of Mississippi, where he served until the battalion was mustered out.

The battalion was ordered to Vicksburg for that purpose, and the men were mustered out of the United States service on the 29th of October, left for New Hampshire, under command of Capt. Dana W. King, and arrived at Concord on the evening of the 6th of November, where they were received by Adjutant General Natt Head, and Governor Frederick Smyth, who addressed them in a few appropriate words, tendered the thanks of the State, and invited them to a hot supper at the hotels. On Friday, the 9th of November, the battalion was paid off and discharged. One hundred and seventy-nine enlisted men returned, the last representatives of over one thousand seven hundred men who had served in the Eighth Regiment. Captains Newell and Landers, Surgeon Thompson, and Lieuts. Bowen and Fletcher, with about twenty-five enlisted men, were left at the South, preferring to be discharged there to returning with the battalion. The officers who returned with the command were Captain Dana W. King, commanding the battalion; and Lieutenants George B. Johnson, James H. Marshall and Nelson H. Peterson.

As a recognition of their services the officers of the battalion were presented with brevet commissions by the Governor, making the roster as follows:

Colonel, James H. Landers;
 Lieut. Colonel, Dana W. King;
 Major, James R. Newell;
 Surgeon, Andrew J. Thompson;
 Company A—Captain, George B. Johnson;
 First Lieut. Nelson H. Peterson; Company B—Captain, Charles A. Bowen;
 First Lieut. James F. W. Fletcher; Company C—Captain, James H. Marshall;
 First Lieut. James L. Wheeler.

The Eighth Regiment was actively engaged in the following battles :

Georgia Landing,	October 27, 1862.
Camp Bisland,	April 12 and 13, 1863.
Port Hudson,	May 27 and June 14, 1863.
Sabine Cross Roads,	April 8, 1864.
Cane River,	April 23, 1864.
Moreauville,	May 17, 1864.
Yellow Bayou,	May 18, 1864.

Besides these the regiment was engaged in fifty-three distinct skirmishes, some of which, previous to the war of the rebellion, would have been considered sanguinary battles, and in all of them was distinguished for coolness and bravery.

NINTH REGIMENT.

After the Eighth Regiment had been sent to the field, recruiting in New Hampshire ceased, and by order of the War Department all recruiting offices for volunteers were closed and their furniture sold. In May, 1862, an order was received from the War Department, requesting New Hampshire to furnish an additional regiment of infantry. A bounty of twenty dollars was offered—which was subsequently increased to fifty dollars—by the State to each person who might enlist in any new regiment, and sixty dollars to those who would enlist in either of the regiments then in the service. The men rendezvoused at Concord, and during the month of July a large portion of the regiment was mustered into the United States service. The organization was finally completed on the 23d, and left the State for the seat of war on the 25th of August, under command of Colonel Enoch Q. Fellows, who had previously resigned his commission in the Third Regiment. COLONEL ENOCH Q. FELLOWS.

Colonel Fellows was born at Sandwich, Carroll County, New Hampshire, on the 20th of June, 1825. His father was a respectable farmer, in humble circumstances. He attended public schools in his native town until old enough to go to an academy, from which time until he was nineteen years old he attended different academies and taught school alternately. He had nearly completed his preparatory college course when he received an appointment to the United States Military Academy at West Point, where he entered in 1844, and remained about two and a half years, standing, when he left fifth in his class in conduct, and eight in general standing. Among his school fellows there were George B. McClellan, Ambrose E. Burnside, D. N. Couch and Jesse L. Reno, all of whom were Major Generals in the Union army, the famous Stonewall Jackson, of the rebel army, and many others who were prominent actors during the war.

After leaving West point Colonel Fellows returned to his native town, and for years took an active part in the militia of the State. He held several commissions and rose to the rank of Brigadier General. In 1854 he was appointed Inspector in the Boston Custom House, which position he held three years. When the rebellion broke out, in 1861, Colonel Fellows was the first man in the State, north of Concord, to volunteer, and one of the very first to take an active part in enlisting and organizing the three months volunteers, called for by President Lincoln, immediately after the surrender of Fort Sumter to the rebels. He acted as Adjutant during the organization of the First Regiment, was commissioned to that place by Governor Goodwin, served with the regiment during its term of enlistment, returned with it to the State, and the next day after being mustered out was commissioned Colonel of the Third Regiment. He organized this regiment and commanded it about a year—except about three months, when he was acting Brigadier General. When General T. W. Sherman was getting up his great Naval Expedition he came to Concord and obtained the promise of the Governor that the Third Regiment, then being organized, should form a part of it. Colonel Fellows was the first Colonel of the fifteen regiments composing that expedition to be mustered in, and the Third was the first regiment to report to General Sherman in New York City, and he was consequently the ranking Colonel of the Expedition. The Expedition took Port Royal on the 7th of November, 1861. During the months of December, 1861, and January, 1862, all the brigadier generals were assigned to duty elsewhere, and Colonel Fellows was appointed the first commandant at Hilton Head, S. C. He enjoyed the most unbounded confidence of General Sherman, both as an officer and a gentleman, till he was relieved in March, 1862. Having been absent from his home about a year he then asked for a furlough, and General Sherman endorsed his application as follows—he having been relieved: “The valuable service performed in the Expeditionary Corps by Colonel Fellows, and his long and close attention to his important duties here, renders the indulgence asked for a very reasonable one, which I intended to grant him." Colonel Fellows' request was granted at once, but just then there was a disturbance at Edisto Island, and General Benham asked General Sherman which was the best regiment to send, and was answered, the Third New Hampshire, and that regiment was accordingly ordered there. Colonel Fellows then told General Benham that, under the circumstances, he did not wish to avail himself of his furlough at that time, if he could be of service. The General expressed many thanks for the offer, and immediately placed Colonel Fellows in command of all the troops at Edisto and vicinity, consisting of three and a half regiments of infantry, one company of cavalry, four pieces of artillery, and one gunboat. He remained there three or four weeks, and drove the rebels from Jehosse Island, and after the capture of Fort Pulaski, and all had become quiet, Colonel Fellows was relieved and received his furlough.

While at home, without his knowledge, the Governor and Council, the Adjutant General and Secretary of State recommended him to President Lincoln for an appointment as Brigadier General of United States Volunteers, as a man well qualified by education, ability and experience to fill the position with honor to the state and benefit to the service. When the Ninth Regiment was being enlisted, about this time, Governor Berry offered the command of it to Colonel Fellows, which he said he would accept, if the Governor thought best. He accordingly resigned his commission as Colonel of the Third, and accepted that of Colonel of the Ninth, on the 14th of June, 1862. On arrival in Washington with the Ninth Regiment, Colonel Fellows was immediately assigned to the command of a brigade, though not the ranking colonel. This was about the time of General Pope's defeat, and in a few days the army was reorganized under General McClellan, and the Ninth Regiment was assigned to an old brigade; and in less than three weeks from the time the regiment left New Hampshire it was engaged in the battles of South Mountain and Antietam. At South Mountain the Ninth Regiment, under Colonel Fellows, made one of the most brilliant bayonet charges of the whole war, drove a rebel battery from the field, capturing several prisoners, and he was especially complimented on the field by Brigadier General Nagle, in command of the brigade, and Major General Reno, in command of the corps. General Reno had scarcely turned his horse from Colonel Fellows to depart, after congratulating him upon the good behavior of his men, when he received his death wound. Soon after the battle of Antietam, Colonel Fellows broke down in health and resigned. He was undoubtedly one of the most capable officers in the army from New Hampshire during the four years continuance of the war. He was always faithful and attentive to duty and cool and skillful in action. His military education and experience, at a time when there were but few men in the State who knew any thing about the requirements of troops fitting for the field, were of great benefit to the service.

At the close of his military service Colonel Fellows returned to his native town, Sandwich, where he has since resided. In 1868 and 1869 he was an active and valuable member of the popular branch of the New Hampshire Legislature from Sandwich; and in the latter year was appointed a United States Assistant Assessor of Internal Revenue in the First District. His principal business is that of private banker, at St. Paul, Minnesota, where he has a partner, and from which he derives a handsome income.

COLONEL HERBERT B. TITUS.

At the time the rebellion broke out Colonel Titus was engaged in teaching, at Chesterfield, Cheshire County, New Hampshire, and was among the first men in that County to enlist under the call of the President for seventy-five thousand volunteers for three months, and was on the 4th of June, 1861, commissioned Second Lieutenant of Company A, in the Second Regiment, in which position he served, sharing the fortunes of that regiment, until June, 1862, when he was promoted to Major of the Ninth New Hampshire Regiment. He was promoted to Lieut. Colonel of the same on the 26th of August, of the same year, and on the resignation of Colonel Fellows, was promoted to Colonel on the 22d of November, in which position he continued until the muster out of his regiment, June 10, 1865. He was wounded in the battle of Antietam by a rifle ball, while he was himself using a musket. His loss to the regiment was very severely felt, for he had already won the confidence of the men, and Colonel Fellows was the only field officer left—Major Everett not yet having joined the command. On this occasion, and also at South Mountain, a few days previous, Lieut. Colonel Titus distinguished himself for gallantry and skill. During his term in the army he was often in command of a brigade, and rendered valuable service in every position where the fortunes of war placed him. He returned to the State with his regiment, after the close of the war, and was mustered out with it. Subsequent to the close of the war Colonel Titus purchased an extensive tract of land in Virginia, where he now resides, engaged in its care and cultivation.

MAJOR GEORGE WASHINGTON EVERETT.

Major Everett was born at New London, Merrimack County, New Hampshire, on the 19th of November, 1819. He was educated in the public schools and academy of his native town. He pursued a course of legal study in the office of Walter P. Flanders, Esq., and was admitted to the Merrimack County Bar in October 1847. During his whole course of study he was dependent upon his own exertions for means, and exhibited great diligence and ambition. Soon after he was admitted to the bar he commenced the practice of law in his native town, where he continued until he entered the army. In 1852 and 1856 he was elected a member from New London of the New Hampshire House of Representatives, and took a prominent part on committees and in debates. He was Solicitor for Merrimack County five years, from 1856 to 1861, and discharged the duties of that office in an able and acceptable manner.

In the summer of 1862, Major Everett felt that he owed a duty, and his life, if need be, to his country, and accordingly offered his services to the Governor. He was commissioned Major of the Ninth Regiment on the 26th of August, 1862, but did not leave the State with his regiment, on account of sickness, but joined it soon afterward, and was with it in several battles and skirmishes, in all of which he proved himself a brave and faithful officer. In August 1863, as the Ninth Regiment was coming up the Mississippi river from Vicksburg, Major Everett was taken dangerously ill, and continuing to grow worse, he stopped on his arrival at Cincinnati, hoping that a few days rest would restore him to health; but he failed rapidly until the 27th of August, 1863, when he died, lamented by his regiment and a very large circle of friends in New Hampshire. His remains were sent home in charge of Lieut. Orville Smith, to his sorrowing wife and family. His funeral took place at New London on the 31st of August, and was attended by a very large concourse of friends and citizens. At the conclusion of the general services in the Baptist church, where he had been a worshipper from early boyhood, the body was given in charge of the Mount Horeb Commandery of Knights Templar, of Concord, of which organization the deceased was an esteemed associate, and by the members was conveyed to the village cemetery, where with impressive ceremonies it was sacredly consigned to the grave.

The Ninth Regiment left Concord for Washington on the 25th of August, 1862, and was soon encamped at Arlington Heights. This was among the darkest days of the rebellion, when General Pope's broken and dispirited troops were falling back upon the national capital. Lee had invaded Maryland and was marching on Harrisburg.

All available troops were being brought into the field, and the Ninth left camp on the 6th of September to join the armies reunited under McClellan, and already moving to oppose the progress of Lee. The regiment was assigned to the First Brigade, Second Division, Ninth Corps, Colonel James Nagle, of the Forty-eighth Pennsylvania, commanding the brigade, which was then on the march, and which was overtaken by the Ninth at the Monocacy river, on the 13th of September.

BATTLE OF SOUTH MOUNTAIN.

About noon on the 14th of September the Ninth Regiment was ordered into the field for its first battle, which had already commenced at South Mountain. The enemy occupied the crest of the mountain, the sides of which were steep and rugged, covered with wood and underbrush. The Ninth was formed in line of battle, about half way up the mountain, and was ordered to charge, by Colonel Fellows, which they did in the most gallant style. The rebels opened upon them from above, but most of the bullets passed over their heads. A cross fire from a rebel battery caused some confusion in the line, but did not stop its progress. The enemy hastily retreated, leaving the summit of the mountain in the hands of the Ninth and their comrades. For its gallantry the regiment was complimented by Colonel Nagle, commanding the brigade, and General Reno, commanding the corps. The regiment suffered a loss of twenty-five men wounded, two of whom subsequently died.

BATTLE OF ANTIETAM.

On the morning of the 17th of September the Ninth Regiment moved on to the battle ground of Antietam, and took position with the Ninth Corps, on the left of the army, opposite the famous stone bridge over Antietam Creek. The enemy was formidably posted on the opposite side, on a high, steep bank, heavily wooded, and presenting a discouraging obstacle to an advance. The lines were formed along the banks of the stream, at a distance of little more than two rods apart. For two hours each side poured into the other an incessant fire of musketry, the enemy having the advantage in position, being considerably higher than the Union lines, and partly protected by rude earth works. During this terrific fire Lieut. Colonel Titus was wounded, while himself using a rifle. Colonel Fellows was the only field officer left—Major Everett not yet having joined the regiment. The Ninth behaved admirably during the fight and in the fierce contest which ensued in the passage of the bridge, not a man left the ranks except he was ordered away with some wounded comrade.

The bridge was finally carried by storm, and the Ninth was one of the first regiments over, climbing the opposite slope under a murderous artillery fire. The enemy was forced back, and night came on with a substantial victory for the Union arms. The Ninth lost in the engagement ten men killed and eighty wounded. Among the wounded, besides Lieut. Colonel Titus, were Captains Cooper and Whitfield. For a regiment not yet a month old, and with only the discipline and drill of an active campaign, amid the smoke and confusion of the battle field, the conduct of the Ninth deserved and received special commendation.

On the 1st of October the brigade moved to Pleasant Valley and went into camp. On the 26th the army commenced its pursuit of Lee. Major Everett joined the regiment soon after the battle of Antietam. On the 17th of November, while at Warrenton, Colonel Fellows resigned, on account of impaired health, and on the 22d Lieut. Colonel Titus was commissioned Colonel, and Captain John W. Babbitt, of Company I, was promoted to Lieut. Colonel. When General Burnside assumed command of the army of the Potomac, the Ninth Corps was placed in command of General Wilcox, and was assigned to the right grand division under General Sumner. The division to which the Ninth belonged was commanded by General Sturgis. General Sumner was the first to reach the Rappahannock, and encamped to the north and east of Falmouth, where the Ninth Regiment was engaged in camp duties until the

BATTLE OF FREDERICKSBURG.

On the 12th of December the Ninth Regiment crossed the Rappahannock and remained in the streets of Fredericksburg all that day and the succeeding night. Early the next morning heavy firing commenced, and the regiment was put under arms, and so continued until one o'clock in the afternoon, when the brigade was ordered into the fight, a single regiment at a time. The Ninth moved to the left and rear of the city, and swinging to the right, advanced along the open field toward the railroad, which having crossed, it came under a galling fire of artillery. Here they advanced at a double quick, the fire increasing each moment until they came to a deep cut, through which ran a carriage road, the sides being fifteen feet high, and nearly perpendicular. Into this cut they rushed, when Lieutenant Lewis was hit by a piece of bursting shell, and fell headlong down the embankment a corpse. Two pieces of rebel artillery enfiladed the road, and poured into the men crowded into these narrow limits a murderous fire of shell and canister. Many of the officers and men, with great courage, made their way to the summit of the embankment, and pulled those more heavily laden up after them. Here the same murderous fire from the front, increased by volleys of musketry, met them full in the face. There was, however, no stop, and, swinging to the left, the Ninth advanced across an open field, every foot of which was exposed to the fire of the rebel artillery, and was already thickly strewn with dead and wounded, the Ninth adding its quota to the ghastly scene. In crossing fences and ditches the companies got somewhat separated from each other. The color-bearer was mortally wounded, and several of the color-guard had been killed or disabled. When Sergeant Dinsmore, who carried the national colors, fell mortally wounded, Lieut. C. D. Copp, of Company C, caught them up, and, advancing to the front, waved them, exclaiming, "Hurrah, boys! Come on!" maintaining his position until the front line was reached. Here the men, sheltering themselves as much as possible behind knolls, embankments and stone walls, kept up a nearly fruitless fire on the impregnable position of the enemy until after dark, when it was withdrawn to the city, and recrossed the river with the rest of the corps and went into camp on its old ground. The Ninth was commanded in this battle by Lieut. Colonel Babbitt. The loss of the regiment was four killed and eighty-two wounded. Lieut. Lewis was among the killed, and Captain A. S. Edgerly and Lieut. Charles A. Harndon were of the wounded.

The Ninth Regiment remained in camp opposite Fredericksburg until the fore part of February, 1863, when with its Corps it was ordered to Newport News, and from thence on the 25th of March embarked for Baltimore, on its way to Lexington, Kentucky, where it arrived on the 31st. The brigade was broken up and the regiments were scattered about the State for the purpose of fostering the Union sentiment and discouraging the appearance of disloyalty. The Ninth was in the Blue Grass region, where provisions were abundant and cheap, and the men lived upon the fat of the land. On the 2d of May the Ninth marched to Paint Lick, where it joined the rest of the brigade, which was soon ordered to join General Grant's force which was besieging Vicksburg, where they arrived about the middle of June. General Johnston's army was approaching from the east and threatening Grant's rear. To meet the emergency the Ninth Corps was, two days after its arrival, embarked on boats and sent up the Mississippi to the Yazoo, and up that river to Milldale, a mile or two from Haines' Bluff, where a line of defense was taken up, stretching from the Yazoo on the north to the Big Black on the south. Timber was slashed and batteries were erected along the line, and the approach of Johnston to the relief of Vicksburg was thus effectually cut off. Here the men were subjected to the severest toil, many privations and a most unhealthy climate.

Vicksburg surrendered on the 4th of July, and Johnston began to retreat, with the Ninth Corps in hot pursuit. On the 5th General Sherman came up with the Fourteenth Corps, and assumed command of the whole force engaged in the chase. Johnston made a stand at Jackson, and awaited the arrival of Sherman. On the night of the 13th, Captain Alexander, of Company B, who had posted his men on the picket line and was attempting to pass back in the intense darkness, along the line, was shot by his own men, who had been ordered to fire upon any object approaching from that direction. Captain Alexander died in consequence on the 23d. Two or three hours later a party of rebels, who knew the ground perfectly, crept stealthily upon that portion of the line, and bayoneted private Dustin, of Company B, whose death-cry brought every man instantly to his feet. Others had hand to hand conflicts with their assailants, and one or two were wounded: but all stood their ground, and though they could only fire at random upon their unseen foe, the attack was repulsed and the line held. Preparations were made for storming the town, but Johnston retired to Meridian, and Sherman not thinking it expedient to follow him into the enemy's country, returned with his command to Milldale, about sixty miles.

On the 10th of August the Ninth embarked and arrived at Covington, Kentucky, on the 21st. On the way Major Everett was taken sick and died soon after reaching Cincinnati. After four days passed at Covington they removed to Camp Nelson, near Nicholasville. General Burnside had taken Knoxville, and the Ninth Corps was called upon by him to take part in the campaign in East Tennessee, while the Ninth Regiment was sent to Paris to guard the railroad between Cincinnati and Camp Nelson, being scattered along in detachments for a distance of twenty miles. The regiment was suffering extremely from disease occasioned by the miasma of the Yazoo swamps, so that the monthly returns for August showed that out of three hundred and six present, one hundred and forty-three were on the sick list, while most of the officers were at home on sick leave. Though the men had the best of care and hospital accommodations, it was many weeks before they fully recovered from the effects of the disease contracted on the Yazoo.

During the month of December a large number of recruits joined the regiment, most of whom were a disgrace to the service. The whole number assigned to the Ninth during 1863 and 1864, was eight hundred and twenty-eight, and of these four hundred and forty-four either never reached their command, or deserted very soon afterward, while of those who remained many were worthless, from various causes. The regiment, by its good conduct won the confidence and esteem of the people, who expressed their regret when it was removed.

The Ninth was relieved from duty on the railroad on the 15th of January, 1864, and soon after proceeded to Cumberland river, arriving at Camp Burnside, at the head of steamboat navigation, on the 30th, where a force was needed to protect the supplies for the army in East Tennessee, which were sent forward to Knoxville by way of Cumberland Gap, by large trains of pack mules. Soon guerillas began to be troublesome in the mountain districts, and the Ninth New Hampshire Regiment and First Ohio Artillery were ordered to proceed to Knoxville, by different routes—the latter to do duty in the town and the former to rejoin the Ninth Corps. The march was one of extreme hardship and privation, the men suffering as none others suffered, perhaps, except in East Tennessee. They reached Knoxville on the 17th of March, and joined the Ninth Corps. On the 21st the Corps started for central Kentucky, and the regiment re-crossed the Cumberland Mountains by a new route, and came out at Camp Burnside on the 27th, and four days later reached Nicholasville again.

The Ninth was ordered to Annapolis, Md., where it arrived on the 5th of April, and was placed in the Second Brigade of the Second Division, with the Sixth and Eleventh New Hampshire, under the command of Colonel S. G. Griffin, of the former regiment. Here convalescents and recruits arrived sufficient to swell the number of men present for duty to five hundred and twenty-eight. The brigade to which the Ninth belonged crossed the Rappahannock and joined the Army of the Potomac on the 4th of May.

At the battle of the Wilderness, on the 6th of May, Captain Augustus S. Edgerly, of Company C, who was serving on the staff of Colonel Griffin, was killed. The division moved to Fredericksburg, on the 9th, and bivouacked just inside the works surrounding the city. Here Colonel Titus was carried to the hospital, sick with a fever, and the command of the regiment devolved upon Major Chandler.

BATTLE OF SPOTTSYLVANIA.

At daybreak on the 12th of May a grand charge was ordered along the whole line, the signal for which was to be the opening of the artillery. The Ninth Regiment numbered about five hundred muskets, and never in better discipline, was stationed on the extreme right of the Ninth Corps. The brigade moved forward in line of battle, preceded by the skirmishers, Companies I and G, which, commanded by Captain Hough, and Lieuts. Rice and Sylvester, in their progress captured about fifty of the enemy's skirmishers. In moving through a dense pine forest the Ninth, though preserving its line as well as possible, got partially separated from the rest of the brigade, and gained the open field in front considerably in advance of them. The Second Corps was immediately on the right, and had charged a little in advance of the Ninth. They had already reached the rebel works, taken possession of the first line, with a large number of prisoners, and were now being hard pressed by a counter march on the part of the rebels. As the Ninth issued from the woods with the remainder of the brigade, the second Corps set up a loud cheer at the sight of reinforcements. A shower of bullets from the rebels greeted their appearance, but they were so widely aimed that few took effect. The brigade moved steadily forward and down the intervening slope, over fallen trees and piles of brush, toward the enemy, concealed by a dense fog which covered the field, but who were pouring forth in dense masses to meet the impending assault. At this juncture an officer of the Second Corps rode up, shouting, "Colonel, or whoever commands that battalion, for God's sake change front, for they are coming in on my left!" In another moment he fell from his horse pierced by a rebel bullet. Major Chandler gave the necessary order and the regiment commenced the movement, when the rebel bullets began to take effect. A series of light outer works, from which the rebel pickets had retired was soon reached, when the command was given to halt and fire. At the first volley many of the pieces were so damp that they missed fire, while others were so damaged that the cartridges barely ignited sufficiently to empty the barrels. The fire of the enemy increased to a continued roar, who emerged from the fog directly in front and to the left of the Ninth, at a distance of scarcely a hundred paces, and advancing in three lines of battle. A conflict more terrible, and a slaughter more destructive than any in which the regiment had ever engaged, now ensued. The two lines advanced so closely together that their rifles flashed in each other's faces. The left was separated from the rest of the brigade, and was wholly unprotected. The enemy were rapidly swinging round into the rear, and the only alternative was to fall back while the way was yet open; and rallying around the colors, already pierced by a score of bullets, the regiment fell back to the woods, leaving the dead and wounded on the field. While falling back the color-bearer was wounded, and Corporal Parsons, of Company E, seizing the national colors, bravely shouted to the men to rally around and protect them. Major Chandler was wounded, and would have fallen into the hands of the enemy had not some of the men taken him in a blanket and borne him from the field. The woods gained, the remnant of the battalion was reorganized and took position with the brigade in the line, which was successfully held against the enemy during the day.

Captain Smith was killed; Lieut. Colonel Babbitt, who was temporarily in command of the Thirty-second Maine, was wounded; Lieut. Sylvester was wounded mortally; Major Chandler seriously, and Lieut. Wilcox was captured. Forty-two enlisted men were killed outright, ninety-four were wounded, and seventy were missing. The latter were nearly all wounded, and in the hands of the enemy. The fight was short, but the most severe one in which the Ninth Regiment was engaged.

On the 18th another advance was ordered, in which the Ninth, with other regiments, was used as support. It was exposed to a severe artillery fire, during which Captain Stone, who was in command of the regiment, was mortally wounded. The command then devolved upon Captain Buswell. The regiment lost, besides Captain Stone, two men killed and seventy-six more or less wounded. At Ptolopotamy Creek, on the 28th in a skirmish with the enemy, the regiment lost one man killed and sixteen wounded. At Cold Harbor, on the 3d of June, the Ninth supported a battery, and suffered a loss of only one or two men wounded.

On the 16th of June, after a march of thirty miles, the Ninth with its brigade arrived in the vicinity of Petersburg, and during the night, in which it was engaged in a smart skirmish with the enemy, several men were wounded. The next day the regiment had fifteen men wounded out of the hundred and twenty-five to which its effective strength had been reduced. The next two months the Ninth spent in the trenches before Petersburg, participating with the other troops in the hardships of the siege. On the 3d of July Captain Little was badly, and on the 22d Captain Buswell mortally wounded by stray shots from the enemy.

In the battle of the "Mine," on the 30th of July, the Ninth bore a prominent part. Its position was in the first line of the division, just in front of the rebel fort, where the troops were massed for the assault. At the instant of the explosion it sprang forward, and was the first to plant its colors on the ruined work. In the fierce conflict that ensued for the possession of what had been gained, the regiment was conspicuous. Twice its colors fell, but they were quickly raised again. Sergeant Wilkins re-captured the flag of the Twenty-first Massachusetts, which had been taken, and afterward received a medal from the War Department in acknowledgment of his gallantry. Lieut. Simons, then a sergeant, pushed far ahead of his regiment, and found himself surrounded but refused to surrender. He shot one man, bayoneted another, was knocked down with the buttend of a musket, was helped into a bomb-proof where were five North Carolinians, all of whom he captured and brought into the Union lines in triumph. Captain Hough, who commanded the regiment was frightfully wounded, taken prisoner, but was subsequently exchanged. In the retreat which followed Lieut. Sampson was killed, Lieuts. Green and Cheney were wounded, and Lieut. Drew was captured. Besides these the regiment lost in killed, wounded and missing, ninety-two, or about one-half the number engaged.

On the 30th of September, at Poplar Grove Church, the Ninth Regiment was again engaged, but from the superior force of the enemy was obliged to retreat to save itself from capture—a fate which all did not escape. Lieuts. Rice and Emery, the latter, at the time, on General Griffin's staff, were killed, Lieut. Allen was wounded, and Lieut. Quimby captured. One hundred and twenty enlisted men were killed, wounded or missing. The color-bearer, Corporal Brown, who showed signal bravery at the battle of the "Mine," was captured, though not till he had stripped the colors from the staff and torn them into shreds.

The regiment rested until the 27th of October, when it participated in the movement on Hatcher's Run, but were not actively engaged. On the 5th of November Colonel Titus returned to the regiment; on the 8th the men voted for President; on the 24th they celebrated Thanksgiving, a bountiful dinner having been sent them from home; on the 29th the Corps was moved to the Jerusalem Plank Road, and the Ninth was stationed in the rear of Fort Alexander Hayes, where they passed an agreeable winter. During the winter Colonel Titus was much of the time in command of the brigade, and the command of the regiment devolved on Captain Cooper.

The Ninth took no active part in the battles in the month of April, 1865, which sealed the fate of the Confederacy, being a part of the force left to hold the lines in front of the city of Petersburg, while the final flank movement of the Army of the Potomac was being made on the left. The Ninth, with two other regiments, was detailed on the 6th to guard Ewell's army, to the number of eight thousand men, which had been captured two days before. The regiment embarked for Alexandria, which place it reached on the 27th, and remained there about a month. It participated in the grand review of the army at Washington on the 23d of May. All the recruits of the Ninth were transferred to the Sixth New Hampshire Regiment. The Ninth was mustered out of the United States service on the 10th of June, the next day started for home, and on the 14th Colonel Titus returned the colors to the Governor at the State House, the men deposited their arms at the military depot, the regiment was discharged and paid, leaving an imperishable record upon the roll of fame.

TENTH REGIMENT.

The Tenth Regiment was raised under a call in July, 1862, from the War Department for three hundred thousand three years troops. The State bounty of fifty dollars was continued to all new recruits, and towns, to avoid the impending draft, voted liberal bounties to their citizens who would enlist and be counted on their respective quotas. Capt. Michael T. Donohoe, of the Third Regiment, was appointed Colonel and John Coughlin, of Manchester, was commissioned Lieut. Colonel. Both these gentlemen, with other officers appointed for the regiment, commenced the work of enlisting men, about the middle of July. These gentlemen appealed to the patriotism of the people, stating the necessities of the country in eloquent terms, and called upon their fellow countrymen to fill the ranks of the Tenth Regiment without delay, and defend the flag of their adopted country. The camp was established at Manchester, which city furnished the largest part of six companies. The men began to arrive at the rendezvous on the 20th of August, and on the 5th of September the organization of the regiment was completed, and it was mustered into the United States service, numbering nine hundred and twenty-eight officers and men. The following were the field, staff and line officers, with their official record, during the whole term of service of the regiment:

GENERAL MICHAEL T. DONOHOE.

General Donohoe was born at Lowell, Mass., Nov. 22, 1838. He was educated at the Lowell schools and at the College of the Holy Cross, Worcester, Mass. At the outbreak of the rebellion he was engaged in business at Manchester, where he had great influence with the Irish population. When the Third Regiment was called for he enlisted a full company, and went with it to Concord, early in August, 1861. This company was lettered C, and he was commissioned Captain of it. He went with the regiment to the field, and participated in nearly all its marches and battles, showing much true patriotism and valor on all occasions, and was often commended for his conduct as an officer.

When in the summer of 1862 three hundred thousand troops were called for by the President, to meet the emergency in which the country was placed by the defeats of the Union army, it was determined by the Governor and Council to raise an Irish regiment in this State, and it was designated the Tenth Infantry. Captain Donohoe, who had distinguished himself as an officer in the Third Regiment, was offered the command of the Tenth, and signified his willingness to accept the responsible position. He was commissioned Colonel on the 6th of August, 1862, and soon came home and assumed the duties. Colonel Donohoe, Lieut. Colonel Coughlin, also of Manchester, and others who had been commissioned in the Tenth Regiment, addressed meetings of citizens in that city and other places, appealing especially to their fellow countrymen, and very soon secured the requisite number of men—Manchester furnishing the larger part of six companies. The regiment was fully organized, mustered into the United States service, and left the State for the seat of war in September—but little more than a month after Colonel Donohoe received his commission. He went with his regiment to the field, and its history, with that of the Third, go far toward making up Colonel Donohoe's personal military record.

In the summer of 1863, and during much of the time afterward, until the close of the war, Colonel Donohoe was in command of his brigade. He was wounded severely on the 29th of September, 1864, when in command of the skirmish line in the assault on Fort Harrison. Early in the day his horse was shot under him. He showed great coolness and bravery until wounded late in the day. He was appointed Brigadier General United States Volunteers, by brevet, for gallant conduct in the field, to date from March 13, 1865. His regiment was among the first to enter the city of Richmond, on the 3d of April, 1865. Three months and a half afterward the Tenth, Twelfth and Thirteenth New Hampshire Regiments were mustered out of the service, formed a brigade, and came home under command of Brevet Brigadier General Donohoe.

Soon after the close of the war General Donohoe was appointed to a responsible position on the Concord Railroad. In 1869 he was nominated by the Democratic party as their candidate for one of the board of Railroad Commissioners, and was re-nominated in 1870. He is a gentleman of ability and influence, and enjoys the respect of a large circle of acquaintances.

The Tenth Regiment left camp at Manchester on the 22d of September, 1862, and after a journey interspersed with pleasurable incidents and painful accidents, arrived at Washington on the 25th. At Worcester, Mass., the citizens gave the regiment a bountiful collation, and at Philadelphia they met with an enthusiastic reception and partook of a nice supper at the famous and never to be forgotten Cooper Refreshment Saloon. Between Philadelphia and Baltimore one of the cars ran off the track and private John Cole, of Company K, was thrown from the train and killed. Between Baltimore and Washington the train on which the Tenth was embarked collided with another train from Washington, crushing several of the cars and injuring a number of the men—some fatally. The engineer of the colliding train was suspected of having been the wanton cause of the disaster, which enraged the soldiers, who were with difficulty restrained from shooting him on the spot. He was finally sent to Baltimore under arrest.

On the 30th of September the regiment embarked on cars and proceeded to Frederick City, Md., where it remained until the 4th of October, when it moved to Sandy Hook, opposite Harper's Ferry, and went into camp on Maryland Heights. Two days afterward the regiment moved over the mountains into Pleasant Valley, and was incorporated into the Army of the Potomac. It was assigned to the First Brigade, Third Division, Ninth Corps, the other regiments in the brigade being the Ninth, Eighty-ninth, and Hundred and Third New York.

The last of October the Army of the Potomac moved. The Ninth Corps crossed the mountains, through Knoxville, and thence to Wheatland and Gaskin's Mills, where a halt of about a week was made. On the 15th the march was again resumed, and while a part of the Ninth Corps was crossing the north fork of the Rappahannock the rebel General Early made an attempt to cut off one of the wagon trains, when a short artillery engagement ensued, during which the Tenth was placed in support of one of the batteries. This was its first experience under fire. The corps passed Warrenton Junction, Bealton, Elk Run, Hartwood Church, arriving at Falmouth on the 19th, where the regiment passed a most uncomfortable night in the mud and water, which did not admit of laying down or sleeping.

The Tenth participated in the disastrous battle of Fredericksburg. At daylight on the morning of the 13th of December, Colonel Donohoe was ordered to take his regiment to the front, where it relieved Hawkins' Zouaves, then on picket. Five companies were thrown forward as skirmishers, under cover of a dense fog, which concealed their movements. At about eight o'clock this cleared away before the rising sun, and revealed the close proximity of the men of the two contending armies. The rebels opened with a hot musketry fire, to which the Tenth promptly replied. This opened the ball between the infantry on that part of the line. The remaining five companies were brought up as a support, and the line was ordered forward. The rebel skirmishers withdrew and the Tenth occupied the railroad. About this time the main attacking column issued from the city and advanced to the assault of Marye's Heights, when commenced a most terrific battle, the details of which are given in connection with other regiments. During the battle the Tenth bravely held its position, preventing the enemy from bringing down his light batteries on the flank and enfilading the assaulting lines. Just before dark the remainder of the brigade, which had thus far been held in reserve, near the river, was brought up, and with the Tenth, ordered in to make a last charge against that position where the regiment had all day long witnessed the slaughter of men who had been sacrificed in the futile attempts to carry it. The Ninth New York, whose position was on the right of the line, failed to come up, and to the Tenth New Hampshire fell that place. Before the line was fairly ready for the assault, darkness began to cover the field, and amid the deepening gloom, rendered still deeper by the smoke of battle which lowered over the scene, the brigade moved across the plain in good order, and the Tenth entered with spirit upon its first battle and first charge. Moving in quick time until they began to draw the fire of the enemy's batteries, they then sprang forward at a double quick, cheering as they went. They struggled over fences, through a deep ditch, and coming upon the solid ground beyond, were met by the fierce discharge of thousands of rifles, and the bullets whistled over their heads and through their ranks, while the batteries increased their fire of grape and canister. On they went until in the gathering darkness the rebel muskets seemed to flash in their very faces. Regiments mingled together in confusion, and, unable to see or hear, the line became broken and disorganized, and they were forced to retire. A short distance to the rear the Tenth and Thirteenth New Hampshire were re-formed, but the attack was not renewed, and the battle of Fredericksburg ended with a rebel victory. The dead of the New Hampshire regiments were found nearer the rebel lines than any other of the army. So uncertain was the aim of the rebels, that under all this terrible fire, both of musketry and artillery, the loss of the Tenth was only three officers wounded, and fifty enlisted men killed and wounded.

During the months of January and February, 1863, the health of the regiment was exceedingly bad, and for a long time there was an average of more than one death per day. On the 5th of February Colonel Donohoe started for home on a leave of absence, and the command of the regiment devolved on Lieut. Colonel Coughlin. On the 9th the Ninth Corps embarked and proceeded to Newport News. Company H was detailed as guard to the headquarters of General W. F. Smith, who was at that time in command of the corps. On the 25th a grand review was held by Major General Dix, then in command of the Department, in which the Tenth was conspicuous for its fine appearance and correct marching.

On the 14th of March the Tenth sailed for Norfolk, and from there proceeded by rail to Suffolk, to reinforce the troops there who were threatened with an attack from the enemy. Three days after arrival Assistant Surgeon Harwood died, after a sudden illness. He was very much respected and beloved by the men, and his death was felt to be a calamity to the regiment. Colonel Donohoe returned and assumed command. On the 16th of April the Tenth, with three companies of the Thirteenth and a section of the Second Wisconsin Battery, the whole force commanded by Colonel Donohoe, proceeded down the river to Fort Connecticut. At night Colonel Donohoe, with a hundred and fifty men, made a reconnoissance across the river, which developed the enemy in heavy force. On the 19th all the companies not engaged on other duty, commanded by Captain George W. Towle, marched to Council's Landing on the Nansemond, and joined an expedition under Colonel Ward, of the Eighth Connecticut. The force crossed the river and captured a battery of light guns, two brass howitzers, and about two hundred prisoners. The next morning a portion of the Tenth advanced and dislodged some rebel sharpshooters from a cluster of buildings, burned the houses, and captured two prisoners. The place was evacuated the same afternoon, the retreat being covered by the Tenth, which lost several men captured. The expedition, having captured the guns and foiled the plans of the enemy, was considered a success. The siege of Suffolk continued about four weeks, and was a period of extremely hard work to the troops engaged; and when it was raised the entire army at that place was nearly worn out by the severity of its labors.

On the 3d of May the rebels retreated across the Blackwater, closely followed by the Union forces, who captured many prisoners. A week later the Tenth and Thirteenth Regiments were again brought together in the same brigade. On the 13th the Tenth moved to Bowers' Hill, eight miles, in the direction of Portsmouth, and was soon followed by all the troops, and Suffolk was abandoned. The division was under command of General Getty and marched to Portsmouth, from whence it embarked for Yorktown, where it remained until the 26th of June, when the Tenth embarked and sailed for White House Landing, on the Pamunkey, where it arrived on the evening of the same day.

On the 7th of July, Colonel Donohoe, who had been in command of the brigade for some weeks, was relieved by the return of Colonel Dutton, of the Twenty-first Connecticut, the ranking Colonel, and the former was sent sick to Norfolk. On the 10th the division marched through Williamsburg, and arrived at Yorktown on the afternoon of the same day, where it rested until the 12th, when it marched to Hampton and embarked for Portsmouth, which place it had left twenty-one days before, and the Tenth found their tents still standing and the camp undisturbed. Their marches during this time had some of them been very severe, and the weather had been so hot that some of the men were sun-struck.

About the middle of July General John G. Foster, a native of New Hampshire, assumed command of the Department. On the 30th the camp was removed to Julian's creek—a tributary of the Elizabeth, where work on the fortifications was vigorously pressed forward. In September General Nagle assumed command of the District, reviewed the Tenth Regiment and gave them much credit for good appearance and proficiency in drill. On the 21st of this month and on the 4th of October, three hundred and thirty-five recruits joined the regiment, nearly all of whom were substitutes. The work on the defenses was completed in November, and the winter was spent in perfecting the regiment in drill.

On the 19th of March, 1864, the Tenth Regiment left its camp at Julian's creek and moved to Great Bridge, about fifteen miles; and on the 19th of April moved from there and joined General Butler's forces at Yorktown, which was preparing for an advance up the James river. The regiment was assigned to the Second Brigade, First Division of the Eighteenth Corps—the other regiments in the brigade being the One Hundred and Eighteenth New York, Eighth Connecticut, and Thirteenth New Hampshire. The division was commanded by General W. H. F. Brooks, and the brigade by General Hiram Burnham.

On the 5th of May, just as the Army of the Potomac had left the Rapidan, and was fighting its way through the Wilderness, the army under General Butler started. The Tenth and Thirteenth New Hampshire embarked on board steamers and proceeded to Bermuda Hundred, where they arrived the same evening. The next day the troops advanced toward the Walthal Railroad, the Tenth heading the column of infantry. They had not proceeded far before the cavalry, who were in advance, received a volley from the rebel infantry, posted in a dense swamp, which caused them to fall back in some confusion. Heavy skirmishing ensued, the enemy retiring slowly beyond the railroad. The Tenth kept up skirmishing in front, while a force was sent around to the right and succeeded, after considerable fighting, in gaining possession of the railroad. The regiment was under fire all day, and lost several men wounded.

On the 9th another advance was made. The enemy was encountered at Arrow Hill and forced to retire near Swift creek. The enemy made an attack upon the Union forces after dark, but were met with such spirit as caused them to make a hasty and disorderly retreat. In this attack Lieut. John C. Eaton was mortally, and Lieut. L. F. Larkin severely wounded. A few enlisted men were more or less wounded. Lieut. Eaton was wounded in the leg. He refused to submit to amputation, and died of the wound. The next day the regiment tore up the railroad and bent the rails, and then returned to camp. On the 13th the Tenth was again engaged at a place called the Half Way House, on the Richmond and Petersburg turnpike. Major Angell was placed in command of the skirmish line, and while pushing the skirmishers forward, at about eleven o'clock at night, he was dangerously wounded. Lieut. H. J. Emerson and several enlisted men were wounded at the same time. In the morning a charge was made along the whole line upon the rebel works, from which the enemy retreated. Sergeant Charles H. Hoyt, of Company C, who had been commissioned, though his commission had not reached the regiment, was mortally wounded, and died in field hospital.

On the morning of the 16th, under cover of a dense fog, the enemy made a desperate attack upon the right of the Eighteenth Corps, which position was held by General Heckman's brigade, taking it entirely by surprise and capturing many prisoners, among whom was General Heckman himself. The rebels turned the flank of the corps, and swept every thing before them. When the enemy arrived within easy range, a well-directed volley was opened on them, which was rapidly followed up by continued streams of fire, mowing the rebels down by scores, until at last, with lines utterly broken up, they retired. They repeatedly renewed the attack, but were as often repulsed with terrible slaughter. They made charge after charge upon that portion of the line held by the Tenth and Thirteenth New Hampshire regiments, but were each time driven back with heavy loss. A battery was finally brought up and an attempt made to shell them out, but it had fired hardly a dozen shots before the gunners were disabled by the New Hampshire boys, and the guns were silenced. Orders were sent to Lieut. Colonel Coughlin, commanding the Tenth, to withdraw his regiment. He replied that a brigade further to the left, in the woods, was in danger of being cut off, and asked permission to hold his position until it could be extricated, which was granted. Lieut. Colonel Coughlin held the works for two hours, while the brigade in the woods was notified of their danger and marched out to the rear. The Tenth was retiring and was closely pressed by the enemy, when some of the men showed greater haste than was agreeable to the commanding officer, and he peremptorily ordered a halt, about-faced his command, carefully right-dressed it, and coolly gave the order to fix bayonets. In their surprise the rebels forgot to fire, and the command was quickly about-faced again, and double-quickened to the cover of the woods, before the enemy recovered sufficiently from his surprise to renew his fire. The Tenth rejoined its brigade and the whole force retired to Bermuda Hundred, three companies of the Tenth and one company from the Thirteenth holding the enemy in check during the retreat. The casualties in this affair, which is known as the battle of Drury's Bluff, were slight, owing to the fact that the regiment fought mostly under cover. The losses in the whole movement were about fifty men killed and wounded.

General Butler's army now took up its position on the line of the intrenchments extending from the James to the Appomattox, in front of and nearly parallel with which was the rebel line. Each line was constantly exposed to the fire of the other, and there were frequent alarms along the picket line. On the 26th of May a reconnoissance in force was made beyond Port Walthal, the Tenth forming a part of the support. Colonel Dutton, of the Twenty-first Connecticut, who commanded the brigade, was killed on the skirmish line. On the 31st of May the corps joined General Grant's army, which was face to face with the enemy at Cold Harbor. On the 1st of June the Tenth, though under fire and with the division charging the enemy, and driving them into their works, lost but one man killed and one wounded. Just before daylight the division moved near the enemy's works, and with plates, dippers and bayonets, the men dug for their protection a series of shallow rifle-pits, which were afterward made into a substantial line of works. When the rebels discovered this operation they opened fire, and many of the men were wounded. Lieut. Daniel W. Russell was shot through the head and instantly killed. He was a brave officer, and his loss was deeply mourned by the regiment.

On the 3d of June occurred the sanguinary battle of Cold Harbor. The Tenth regiment was early and hotly engaged. It met the enemy's skirmishers and drove them at a double quick back to their rifle pits, and developing a line of heavy works nearly parallel to that occupied by the Union forces. With a spirited cheer they rushed on, met by the most fearful fire of artillery and musketry they had ever encountered. In less than five minutes ninety officers and men of the regiment had fallen; yet the line pressed on, driving the rebels through their first line, and into a second. Taking position in the line abandoned by the enemy, the regiment at once opened fire, and held their place during the day. A correspondent, describing the battle wrote: "Troops never stood under a more hellish fire than was poured upon the Tenth New Hampshire on this day. Half of the trees were cut down by shells, and, falling upon the dead and wounded, mangled their bodies in a horrid manner. The bark was peeled from the trees by bullets, and saplings, a few inches in diameter, by actual count, bore the marks of from fifty to a hundred bullets each. The bodies of the dead were used for breast-works, and whole platoons were swept away by the awful fire of grape and canister. Imagination stands appalled in the endeavor to paint the horrors of that day." Lieut. James Knott, of Company I, was killed, and Captain John L. O'Brien, Adjutant J. J. Donohoe, and Lieut. William P. Williams were wounded.

The regiment remained at the front, at Cold Harbor, until the 12th of June, losing men killed and wounded every day, when, with its corps it marched to White House, and next day embarked on transports for Bermuda Hundred, and thence crossed the Appomattox and marched toward Petersburg. They encountered the enemy and drove them within a line of works which was gallantly charged and carried by the negro troops, and the rebels retired to their main line of defenses at Petersburg. In the afternoon the artillery opened upon the works a terrific fire, which was kept up about twenty minutes, when the assaulting column advanced, the Second Brigade being opposite Battery No. 5, as it was numbered by the rebels—the Thirteenth New Hampshire deployed as skirmishers. With the utmost gallantry the skirmish line charged on the enemy's rifle-pits, and in an instant more were scaling the ramparts of the fort, and captured nearly every man and all the guns in it. The rebels who escaped retired toward Petersburg, the whole line falling into the hands of the Union forces.

On the 16th, three companies of the Tenth were ordered to dislodge the rebels, who, during the night, had occupied a ravine near the captured works. The enemy opened a galling fire, and Captain James Madden, commanding the line, was killed with a bullet through the heart. He was a brave and noble officer, beloved and lamented by all. The ravine was carried by a furious charge, and many prisoners captured. The three companies took fifty-four men into the fight, nine of whom were killed or wounded. The prisoners captured considerably outnumbered the captors. The Eighteenth Corps returned to the defenses of Bermuda Hundred, and on the 21st again crossed the Appomattox, and took position in the trenches.

On the 22d of August Lieut. Andrew W. Doe was killed while on picket. On the 27th the corps was ordered to the defenses of Bermuda, and the Tenth was placed on the extreme right, resting on James river. This was a comfortable, though an unhealthy, position, and nearly every man was attacked with chills and fever. On the 15th of September, Colonel Donohoe, after a protracted absence, returned to the regiment, and Lieut. Colonel Coughlin was assigned to the command of the Fifth Maryland Veteran Volunteers, and afterward to a provisional brigade of new troops from Pennsylvania; and was subsequently Provost Marshal of the Department of Virginia and North Carolina, including the Army of the James.

FORT HARRISON.

On the 28th of September the Army of the James marched to Aiken's Landing. About midnight the army crossed the river, the Tenth in advance, and before daylight a skirmish line was formed of the Tenth and Hundred and Eighteenth New York, and the advance was begun. At daylight the enemy's skirmishers were encountered and rapidly driven back. Colonel Donohoe, who commanded the skirmish line, had his horse shot under him. The enemy was driven three or four miles to the cover of his works on Chapin's Farm, where the main body of troops came up and formed in the edge of the wood for an assault upon Fort Harrison, a powerful work on the summit of a hill, three-quarters of a mile from the woods, the intervening slope being swept by the enemy's cannon. The First Division emerged from the woods and advancing toward the Fort, thirty pieces of Artillery opened on the columns, and rebel gunboats on the James threw their immense shells across its path. The division moved steadily on, and in quick time, the fast opening gaps quickly closed up, it marched well up to the fort, and, halting for a moment to gather for the blow, it sprang forward with defiant cheers, every step taken at the cost of scores of brave lives; they gained the ditch, mounted the ramparts, and drove the enemy from his guns, which were at once turned to the destruction of those who had just used them with such deadly effect. All of the enemy's dead and wounded fell into the hands of the assailants, and many prisoners and guns were taken. General Burnham, commanding the brigade, was killed while working some of the captured guns. Later in the day another fierce fight occurred, in which Colonel Donohoe was severely wounded. The next day the enemy opened on the fort from all sides, the gunboats and mortar batteries joining in the bombardment. This was followed by an attempt to storm the fort. The advance was to certain defeat and terrible slaughter. Dead and disabled rebels strewed the field. New and successive attempts were made to carry the works, followed by the same fearful carnage. Every advance was coolly repulsed, and the enemy abandoned the undertaking, how reluctantly. A skirmish line, composed of troops from the Tenth and Thirteenth, sallied forth after the routed rebels, and brought in about five hundred prisoners. The victory was complete and important. The losses were far greater on the rebel than on the Union side. General Ord, commanding the corps, and General Stannard, commanding the division, were both wounded—the latter losing an arm. Thus the Tenth had lost its corps, division and brigade commanders. Captain Caswell, who was in command of the regiment after Colonel Donohoe was wounded, was killed. He was a most brave and noble officer. The entire loss of the regiment was thirty-four killed and wounded, out of less than two hundred taken into the fight.

On the 25th of October the Eighteenth Corps moved across the country to the Williamsburg road—the object being to turn the enemy's left. When near Fair Oaks the rebels came to a stand, and were driven by the skirmishers into their works. The Second Brigade, now reduced to about five hundred men, was ordered to charge. It moved forward under the fire of artillery and musketry. It reached a position where to retreat or advance were alike impossible. Far from supports, and few to continue the assault, they were forced to lie down within a few yards of the enemy's works, and wait for darkness to cover their escape. The rebels, however, captured nearly the whole brigade before night came. Only two out of ten officers of the Tenth escaped, and seventy-four men were killed, wounded, or captured. To prevent the colors from falling into the hands of the enemy they were taken from the staffs. The State flag was destroyed, and the stars and stripes were wrapped around the body of Sergeant John H. Durgin, who was afterward taken prisoner, and died at Salisbury, but the flag was never heard from. Lieut. Henry H. Emerson was killed; Captains John C. Keenan and M. F. Corcoran were captured, and Captains Crowley and Doyle, and Lieuts. Larkin, Mitchell and Tucker were wounded. Nearly all the men who were captured died in the rebel prison at Salisbury. The next morning the troops reached camp. They remained in the lines before Richmond all winter, employed in the usual duties of troops before the enemy.

At the final advance on Richmond, in April, 1865, the Tenth was among the first to enter the city. It remained at Manchester, opposite Richmond, on provost guard duty, until about the 21st of June, when it was mustered out of the United States service and in company with the Twelfth and Thirteenth New Hampshire, forming a brigade, under command of Brevet Brigadier General Donohoe, it started for home, arriving in Boston on the 25th. At Nashua, Manchester and Concord the brigade was cordially received and handsomely entertained by the citizens. At Concord the men received their pay and final discharge.

Many officers were detailed from this regiment for important and honorable staff and other duty, though the promotions from it were not so numerous as from some other ones which went from the State. The regiment was largely composed of foreigners, who leave a record highly creditable for patriotism, bravery and good conduct; those who survive are entitled to the gratitude of the State and nation; and its dead upon many hard fought fields, in rebel prisons, and in hospitals, to an honorable record in the history of the great rebellion.

GENERAL WALTER HARRIMAN.

General Harriman was born at Warner, in Merrimack County, New Hampshire, where he has always resided. He received a good public school and academic education in Warner and other places. In his early days he taught school considerably, and thus spent one year in the State of New Jersey. At the age of twenty years—without any especial preparation and without consultation with a single clergyman—he commenced preaching, and was known for years throughout the State as one of its most eloquent and stirring preachers of the Universalist doctrines. He subsequently became engaged in trade, and then interested himself in the political affairs of the state and nation, and abandoned the sacred desk altogether. In 1849 he was elected a representative in the State Legislature from the town of Warner, and was re-elected in 1850. He often engaged in debates in the House, and took a leading position. In June, 1853, he was elected State Treasurer, and was re-elected in 1854, serving the State in this responsible position to the acceptance of all. In 1856 he was appointed by President Pierce a Commissioner to classify and appraise Indian Lands in Kansas Territory, which duty he performed with great care and faithfulness, satisfying all parties interested. In 1858 General Harriman was again elected to the popular branch of the Legislature from the town of Warner, and was a leading member on the Democratic side of the House. In 1859 he was elected to the State Senate from the Eighth District, and was re-elected in 1860. During all these years that General Harriman had given attention to political matters he was known not only in New Hampshire but other states as one of the most able and effective speakers in the party to which he had up to this time belonged. He had at different times spoken upon state and national politics in every county and almost every considerable town in the State, and in some of them several times.

In the spring of 1861 General Harriman became editor of the Union Democrat, at Manchester, and boldly and fearlessly took and ably maintained ground in favor of the national government and the administration of Abraham Lincoln, so far as its war policy was concerned. The principles then and subsequently espoused and advocated by him were so much at variance with those entertained by the body of the party with which he had always acted and labored so earnestly, and which had honored him by appointments and elections to places of trust and profit, as to occasion an estrangement; and from that time he has acted with the national administration and the Republican party. In August, 1862, he was appointed Colonel of the Eleventh New Hampshire Volunteers, immediately set about addressing public meetings, and raised his regiment in a few days. He went to the field with his regiment, and was with it most of the time until the close of the war, except four months that he was in the hands of the enemy as a prisoner. He was captured at the battle of the Wilderness, on the 6th of May, and was not exchanged until the 12th of September, 1864. He was one of the number of Union officers drafted at Macon, Georgia, to be kept in prison in that part of Charleston most exposed by the bombardment of the city from Morris Island by the Union forces. He and other Union officers were kept in this most perilous situation for seven weeks, but fortunately the building in which they were confined was unharmed.

Colonel Harriman was with his regiment in the siege of Petersburg, and when preparations were made for the final assault, which was rendered unnecessary by the evacuation of the city by the enemy, he was in command of a brigade of nine regiments, and thus on the 3d of April, 1865, marched over the rebel works and into Petersburg on the heels of Lee's flying army. He was appointed Brigadier General, by brevet, "for gallant conduct during the war, to date from March 13, 1865." He saw the rebellion snuffed out, and came home with his regiment. In June, 1865, General Harriman was elected Secretary of State, and was re-elected in 1866.

In January, 1867, General Harriman was nominated as the Republican candidate for Governor, and after a sharp and decisive contest—he meeting in joint debate the opposing candidate, Hon. John G. Sinclair,—was elected by a handsome majority. He was re-elected in 1868, after a most severe contest, receiving a larger vote than any candidate for any office had received before, or has received since, in the State. During the two years that he was Governor he discharged the somewhat arduous and difficult duties of the office in a most able and acceptable manner. In 1869 Governor Harriman was appointed Naval Officer at Boston, by President Grant, which position he now holds.

In the fall of 1864, while home from his imprisonment, General Harriman stumped the country for the re-election of President Lincoln, with a success equal, at least, to that of any other speaker in that campaign.

He again stumped the country from Maine to Indiana, for General Grant, in 1868, with most flattering results. He is emphatically a man of the people. His commanding figure—being six feet two inches tall—fine voice and earnest manner, and his perfect familiarity with all the political issues of the time, combine to make him one of the most popular and effective speakers in the country. Such is his popularity as a man that he is said never to have been defeated when a candidate for any office.

LIEUT. COLONEL MOSES N. COLLINS.

Lieut. Colonel Collins was born at Brentwood, Rockingham County, New Hampshire, in April, 1820. He received a thorough academic education at Gilmanton and Hampton Falls, and subsequently for several years was engaged in teaching in the State of Maryland. Later he commenced the study of law in the office of Messrs. Murphy and Bartlett, of Epping, and completed his course in the office of Hon. Gilman Marston, at Exeter. He was admitted to the Rockingham County Bar in 1857, and immediately opened an office at Exeter, where he soon made himself known as an able, industrious and successful lawyer. He was elected a member of the popular branch of the New Hampshire Legislature from Brentwood, in 1855, and from Exeter in 1861 and 1862.

In the summer of 1862, after the disastrous defeat of the Union arms in the second battle of Bull Run; the uncertain results of the Peninsular campaign, and the national existence seemed trembling in the balance, an appeal was made to the patriotism of every American to rush to the rescue of the Government from its imperiled condition. Lieut. Colonel Collins was one of those who regarded the perpetuity of the constitution and laws as paramount to every other consideration, and accordingly offered his services, and his life, if it should be required, to the State authorities, in any capacity where he could do most toward crushing out the rebellion. He was accordingly tendered and accepted the appointment of Major of the Eleventh Regiment of Volunteer Infantry, and before the organization left the State was promoted to Lieut. Colonel. He bore a conspicuous part in nearly all the battles and skirmishes in which the regiment was engaged, being often in command, until that of the Wilderness, on the 6th of May, 1864, when he was among the killed. While gallantly leading his men in a charge upon the enemy, he fell, with a musket ball through the head—a noble sacrifice in a holy cause.

The Eleventh Regiment left Concord on the 11th of September, 1862, and arrived at Washington on the 14th, and was brigaded with the Twenty-first Connecticut, and Thirty-seventh Massachusetts, under command of Brigadier General Henry S. Briggs, of Massachusetts, and constituted a part of Casey's reserved corps. Early in October the Regiment marched to Pleasant Valley, Maryland, and was brigaded with the Thirty-fifth and Twenty-first Massachusetts, Fifty-first New York, and Fifty-first Pennsylvania, and was the Second Brigade, Second Division, Ninth Army Corps, the brigade commander being acting Brigadier General E. Ferrero. On the 27th of October the Army of the Potomac started in pursuit of General Lee's retreating army, the division to which the Eleventh belonged being in the advance. The enemy was closely pursued and driven from point to point, occasionally skirmishing, without any serious engagement, or the loss of any men to the regiment. They reached Falmouth, opposite Fredericksburg, on the 19th of November, and went into camp, where they remained drilling and performing ordinary camp and picket duty, until they engaged in the

BATTLE OF FREDERICKSBURG.

The Eleventh Regiment crossed the Rappahannock on the morning of the 12th of December. It was not put into the fight until about twelve o'clock on the 13th, when it was ordered to the railroad, and thence advanced to the bottom of a slope across an open plain swept by the enemy's fire of infantry and artillery, with nothing to divert that fire, and two or three fences to impede the progress of the regiment and add to its exposure. The order to advance given by Colonel Harriman on the right and Major Farr on the left, was promptly obeyed, and they proceeded upon the double-quick to the point indicated, which was not more than twenty rods from the rebel intrenchments. The position was held by a few companies that had preceded the regiment. For nearly two hours they sustained a tremendous fire from the enemy's strongholds, nearly alone. The enemy were well protected by their intrenchments, while the regiment was considerably below them and only partially protected when flat upon the ground, by the character of the slope. The men were ordered to lie down and load, and then stand up, take aim and fire. Some, however, were so eager for the fray and reckless of consequences, that they persisted in standing bolt upright all the while. The enemy rushed down the slope several times as if to make a charge, but were met with terrific volleys from the Eleventh and repulsed. Every man stood firm and would not yield an inch. After the ammunition was nearly exhausted, only a few rounds being reserved for an emergency, and when there were indications that they might be called upon to make or meet a charge, Colonel Harriman gave orders to fix bayonets. Some of the men by procuring ammunition from other regiments which had come up, and from the cartridge-boxes of the dead, kept up a continuous fire. Regiment after regiment came up, and so the battle raged, the fire of the enemy's musketry and artillery being most murderous and terrific, until after dark, when the regiment was withdrawn. On a single acre, embracing the ground held by the New Hampshire Eleventh, as measured by those who afterward went over to bury the dead, there were six hundred and twenty dead men. The conduct of the regiment on that day was the subject of universal commendation. The General in command, in an address said: "To the new troops who fought so nobly on the 13th, on their first battle-field, thanks are especially due; they have every way proved themselves worthy to stand side by side with the veterans of the Second brigade." The New Hampshire Eleventh were the only "new troops" in that brigade, and of course appropriated this high and well deserved compliment. In this battle the regiment had fourteen men killed, one hundred and fifty-six wounded and twenty-four missing. Of the latter some afterward came in; some are supposed to have been killed, others were wounded or prisoners. Many died of wounds not supposed at the time to be fatal. Among these was Captain Amos B. Shattuck, an excellent officer and much esteemed man.

The Eleventh Regiment remained at the heights of Strafford until the 11th of February, 1863, when with the rest of the corps they were at Newport News until the the 26th of March, and then went to Covington, Kentucky, to protect the people from guerrillas and drive out the rebel forces. They remained in the State, at different places until the 4th of June, when they were removed to Vicksburg. Here Colonel Harriman resigned and Lieut. Colonel Collins assumed command of the regiment.

After the surrender of Vicksburg, on the 4th July, the Eleventh, with other troops started in pursuit of Johnston, the details of which movement are given in the history of the Sixth Regiment. The regiment returned to Milldale where it remained until the 6th of August, suffering like the other regiments from the unhealthiness of the location. From there it proceeded to Cincinnati, where it arrived on the 14th, sadly reduced in numbers and strength, by exposure to the malaria of the swamps in the vicinity of Vicksburg. The regiment marched over to Covington, Kentucky and remained there until the 26th of August, when they were successively at Nicholasville, Camp Parke, Crab Orchard and Loudon, Kentucky, and were then engaged in the SIEGE OF KNOXVILLE.

After a very tedious march the Eleventh arrived at Knoxville on the 29th of October, and on the 17th of November were joined by General Burnside and his gallant little army of thirteen thousand men, who were closely followed by Longstreet with his excellent force, thirty thousand strong, and the siege of Knoxville commenced. Trenches were thrown up; trees were felled; forts were built; dams were erected on the small creek separating the city proper from North Knoxville, and other preparations made for a defense of the city. The Eleventh shared all the hardships of the siege, short rations, etc., until the night of the 28th of November, when the rebels made an attack along the whole line, and skirmishing continued through the night. At five o'clock in the morning the enemy opened with renewed vigor on the whole front, the object being to capture

Fort Sanders, at the west part of the town. Against this Longstreet hurled five thousand of his best troops, who were mowed down like grass by the Union battery. The enemy charged bravely, but it was only to meet sudden death. At seven o'clock the enemy, repulsed at every point, withdrew from the contest, leaving a thousand dead and wounded along the lines, while only ten or twelve men had been killed or wounded on the Union side. In a day or two news came of the victory at Chattanooga, and ringing cheers ran along the whole line. On the 5th of December the enemy commenced a retreat, and troops were sent in all directions in pursuit, who brought in a large number of prisoners. On the 7th an advance was made up the valley, to force Longstreet inside the Clinch mountains, and keep him from Cumberland Gap. After considerable skirmishing the Eleventh went into camp at Lee's Springs, and remained there three weeks. Rations had become very short, some days only a single ear of corn being issued to the men. The Eleventh had drawn very little of any kind of clothing for the five months that they had been in Tennessee, and they could be tracked by the marks of bloody feet while marching. In lieu of shoes, green hides were issued to the men, of which they made moccasins.

The last of February, 1864, Colonel Harriman rejoined the regiment, and was received with much enthusiasm. He had been re-commissioned as Colonel of the Eleventh, and had marched over the mountains, a distance of two hundred and forty miles, in command of a detachment of six hundred recruits for that and other regiments.

On the 18th of March orders were received to proceed to Annapolis, and the troops after long and tedious marching and railroad transportation, arrived there on the 7th of April and went into camp. The Ninth Corps, under its favorite commander, General Burnside, was reorganized, enlarged and made to embrace four heavy divisions. Here they remained, drilling, clothing, arming and organizing until the 23d of April, when it began another march to the front.

At the battle of the Wilderness, on the 6th of May the regiment was under fire nearly all day. At one o'clock the brigade advanced through the Wilderness in good order, in the face of a terrific fire. It passed one line of Union troops lying close to the ground, not engaged, came to another similar line and passed that also, when about three hundred Western men from that line sprang to their feet and rallied under the flag of the Eleventh and joined their fortunes with them. They pressed forward with spirit and carried two successive lines of the enemy's works at the point of the bayonet, driving the rebels from their last intrenchments in their front, and nearly out of the Wilderness. In this bloody engagement the regiment lost severely in both officers and men. Colonel Harriman was captured; Lieut. Colonel Collins was killed; Captain J. B. Clark and Lieut. J. C. Currier were wounded severely, and Captain H. O. Dudley slightly; Lieut. Arthur E. Hutchins, serving on General Griffin's staff, was killed. The command of the regiment devolved on Captain Tilton.

On the 12th of May occurred the battle of Spottsylvania. The advance was commenced before daylight. The enemy's pickets were soon encountered. The Eleventh discovered a regiment of the enemy dressed in Union blue, detected their character, and at once attacked them. The fighting was terrific all along the lines, in which hundreds of pieces of artillery and thousands of muskets dealt death on every hand. Among the wounded in this fight were Adjutant Morrison and Lieut. John E. Cram, who at the time had the colors in his hand. The position of the Eleventh

On the 16th, in a skirmish with the enemy the regiment lost several men killed and wounded. On the 24th the regiment was under fire at North Anna river. On the 25th and 26th in picket and skirmish firing several of the men were wounded.

At Cold Harbor, notwithstanding the regiment was not used in the offensive movement, the battle being fought mainly by the other troops, it was under fire and a number of its men were killed and wounded. Captain Shepard, of Company I, being among the latter. On the 16th and 17th of June, in an engagement with the enemy before Petersburg, the regiment lost several prisoners, among them Lieut. Dimick. On the 21st Lieut. Little was mortally wounded while on the picket line.

The months of June and July were spent by the regiment in the trenches before Petersburg, and on the 30th of July took an active part in the celebrated battle of the "Mine." Captain Tilton, who had been in command of the regiment from the 17th of June, was wounded early in the morning, and the command devolved on Captain Locke. The result of the attack was a repulse of the Union troops. The Eleventh occupied the "crater" most of the day, and lost heavily. The colors were twice lost and twice retaken, and were finally torn in two—the enemy retaining half while the remaining half was retained by the regiment.

In September the regiment took part in the movements on the Weldon railroad. On the 30th it moved to Poplar Grove Church, and was actively engaged at Pegram's Farm, where it lost heavily in killed and wounded. Among the wounded were Captains Locke—commanding the regiment—Currier and Bell, and Lieuts. Davis, Brown and Bean—the latter mortally. Captain Shepard succeeded to the command of the regiment, which he held until the 1st of October, when Captain Dudley returned from leave of absence and succeeded him. On the 27th the regiment took part in the engagement at Hatcher's Run, where it lost two men wounded and the Sergeant Major captured. On the 31st, by order of the commanding general, Captain Shepard again took command of the regiment.

On the 21st of November Colonel Harriman returned to the regiment from his imprisonment, and was cordially welcomed. On the 29th the regiment, with the Ninth Corps, moved to the front of Petersburg, where it went into camp near Hancock Station, on the military railroad, and remained there until the 2d of April, 1865, engaged in picket duty, skirmishing and preparing for the last great struggle. On the 25th of March the enemy made a vigorous assault upon the lines of the Ninth Corps, at Fort Steadman, at daylight. They took the fort, but an hour later were driven back with great slaughter, and a loss of two thousand prisoners.

On Sunday morning, April 2d, at three o'clock, the grand charge all along the lines, from the Appomattox river to Hatcher's Run, was made. It was a great day and a great battle. The division commander having been wounded during the day, General Griffin assumed command, and Colonel Harriman took charge of the brigade, while the command of the Eleventh Regiment devolved on Captain Dudley. About midnight it became evident that the rebels were evacuating Petersburg. The city was on fire at three different points. Half an hour before day, on the 3d, an advance was ordered. The troops moved cautiously at first, but hurriedly very soon, and sprang over the rebel breastworks with a shout of triumph. The brigade commanded by Colonel Harriman, consisting of the Sixth, Ninth and Eleventh, and six other regiments, marched through Petersburg, with bands playing and banners flying. The common people, and especially the colored population, received the troops with demonstrations of joy, while most of the rich, aristocratic, original rebels were sour and glum. Secession was dead, and this latter class distinctly saw and keenly felt it. The army closely pursued Lee to Appomattox Court House, where, on the 9th, he surrendered the great army of Northern Virginia to General Grant, and the four years' war of the rebellion was virtually ended.

The Eleventh Regiment joined in the grand review of the Second, Fifth and Ninth Corps, Sherman's entire army, and some other troops, at Washington, on the 23d and 24th of May. It was the grandest spectacle of the kind ever witnessed in this country. Two hundred thousand armed veterans passed the whole length of Pennsylvania Avenue, the reviewing officers being stationed in front of the President's house. It has been confidently claimed that, in soldier-like bearing and general appearance, no corps eclipsed the Ninth; no division the Second of that corps; no brigade the Second of that division, and no troops those of that brigade from New Hampshire.

The Eleventh was mustered out of the United States service on the 4th of June, and immediately started for home, arriving at Concord on the afternoon of the 7th, meeting with a hearty reception in the State House yard. On the 10th the regiment was paid off and formally discharged. By order of the commanding general of the army, for meritorious conduct in battle, the Eleventh Regiment inscribed upon its banner—"Fredericksburg, Vicksburg, Jackson, East Tennessee, the Wilderness, Spottsylvania, North Anna, Cold Harbor, Weldon Railroad, Poplar Grove Church, Hatcher's Run, Petersburg."

TWELFTH REGIMENT.

On the 10th of August, 1862, in response to the call of the President for three hundred thousand volunteers for three years, some prominent citizens of Belknap and Carroll Counties asked permission of Governor Berry to raise and officer a regiment of infantry, which was granted, on condition that it could be done in ten days. On the 16th of the same month the Adjutant General was notified that ten full companies had been raised, organized and were ready to be mustered into the United States service. They were ordered into camp at Concord on the 3d of September, and by the 25th the regimental organization was completed. GENERAL JOSEPH H. POTTER.

Joseph Hayden Potter is the son of Thomas D. Potter, of Concord, where he was born Oct. 12, 1821. He was, for most of the years 1837 and '38, resident with an uncle in Portsmouth, preparing for college, and, the latter year, assistant in the male High School in that city. Receiving the appointment of Cadet through the recommendation of Hon. Samuel Cushman, of Portsmouth, he entered West Point, Academy in 1839, and graduated in 1843; was Brevet Second Lieutenant First Infantry, July 1, 1843; attached to the Seventh Infantry in 1845; severely wounded in the battle of Monterey, Sept. 21, 1846; brevetted First Lieut. "for gallant and meritorious conduct in the battle of Monterey, Mexico," Sept. 21, 1846; appointed First Lieutenant, Oct. 30, 1847; Adjutant of the Seventh Regiment United States Infantry, for some four years prior to January, 1856; appointed Captain, Jan. 7, 1856, and assigned to Company G, Seventh United States Infantry; ordered with regiment to Utah territory, February, 1858, thence with regiment to New Mexico, May 15, 1860; surrendered by Major Lynde to Texan insurgents, July 27th, 1861; took command of the surrendered troops after their parole, and marched them across the country to Fort Leavenworth, Mo., and from thence to Jefferson Barracks, Mo., arriving there November, 1861; commanding regiment at Fort Niagara from March, 1862, until Sept. 17, 1862; then exchanged, and appointed Colonel of the 12th New Hampshire Volunteer Regiment, assuming command of the same the 21st of that month; severely wounded in the battle of Chancellorsville and taken prisoner, May 3, 1863; exchanged Oct. 20, 1863; ordered to Columbus, Ohio, as Assistant Provost Marshal, Feb. 15, 1864; joined regiment

Sept. 16, 1864, in command of a brigade in the Eleventh Corps, until Dec. 2, 1864, and then assigned to the command of the Second Brigade, Eighth Division, Twenty-fourth Corps; appointed Chief of Staff of the Twenty-fourth Corps, Jan. 16, 1865; assigned to command of Second Brigade, Second Division, Twenty-fourth Corps, July 10, 1865; appointed Brigadier General of Volunteers, May 1, 1865; served with Twenty-fourth Corps until it was broken up, in August, 1865; and mustered out of volunteer service, Jan. 16, 1866; commissioned Major of the Nineteenth Regiment United States Infantry, July 4, 1863; brevetted Lieutenant Colonel United States Army, Dec. 13, 1862, "for gallant and meritorious conduct at the battle of Fredericksburg, Virginia;" brevetted Colonel United States Army, May 3, 1863, for gallant and meritorious service at the battle of Chancellorsville, Va.; brevetted Brigadier General United States Army, March 13, 1865, for gallant and meritorious services in the campaign terminating with the surrender of the insurgent army under Gen. Robert E. Lee; and commissioned Lieutenant Colonel in the Thirtieth United States Infantry, July 28, 1866. General Potter's services and their appreciation can best be estimated by his military record.

The people of the Counties of Belknap and Carroll felt an especial pride in this regiment, as it was almost wholly composed of men and officers from their limits. It was made up of men of character and good standing, who enlisted because the country needed them to suppress the rebellion. No regiment left the State with men of finer personal appearance, or of more gentlemanly bearing, and it sustained a high reputation for honor and sobriety throughout its whole term of service. The regiment left Concord for Washington on the 27th of September, and joined Colonel Wright's division of General Casey's command of the Reserve Army Corps, Defenses of Washington. It was subsequently assigned to General Whipple's division, Third Army Corps, and with it marched from Berlin to Potomac Creek, near Falmouth, Va., a distance of more than a hundred miles, arriving there on the 25th of November. Unaccustomed to camp life, many of the men became sick from exposure, short rations, jaundice and measles. The latter, in most cases, proved fatal, or caused permanent disability.

On the 12th of December, while crossing the Rappahannock river to Fredericksburg, the column was shelled by rebel batteries, and three commissioned officers and five enlisted men of the regiment were severely wounded. During the battle of Fredericksburg, on the 13th and 14th, the regiment was held in reserve, and in position for the support of batteries, and all the time under fire of musketry and cannon. After this memorable battle the Twelfth passed the remainder of the winter at Falmouth, engaged in the usual camp and picket duties.

CHANCELLORSVILLE.

On the 30th of April, 1863, the troops moved in the direction of Chancellorsville. At daylight on the morning of the 3d of May, Gen. Whipple's division was formed in line at the foot of the hill, near the Chancellor House, and at right angles with the plank road. It was ordered forward to meet a heavy force commanded by General Longstreet, and if possible hold the enemy until General Sickles could collect the scattered troops of his corps. Colonel Bowman, commanding the brigade, ordered the Eighty-fourth and One Hundred and Tenth Pennsylvania to be formed parallel with, and to the rear, to prevent a flank movement. These regiments were nearly all captured by an overwhelming force of the enemy, leaving the Twelfth, with a few troops on the right, to cope with a force at least three times its own. One of the most desperate musketry engagements ensued which has ever been witnessed. The regiment behaved splendidly, and retreated in good order, just in time to save its entire capture. General Whipple was mortally wounded, and while being carried from the field on a stretcher, bleeding and dying, said: "I hope I may live long enough to give Colonel Potter and his brave men a just report." The regiment went into the engagement in the morning with twenty-eight officers and five hundred and forty-nine enlisted men. It lost three commissioned officers killed; fifteen commissioned officers wounded; forty-two enlisted men killed; two hundred and twelve enlisted men wounded; fifty-one enlisted men captured; three enlisted men missing, probably killed. Aggregate loss, three hundred and twenty-six. Captains Savage and Keyes and Lieut. Cram were shot dead; Colonel Potter was seriously wounded in the leg; Lieut. Colonel Marsh was wounded in the leg, and Major Savage was struck in the lower jaw by a musket ball and severely wounded.

After the battle of Chancellorsville, and the retreat of the army, under command of General Hooker, the Twelfth returned to the camp it had occupied the previous winter, where it remained until the 11th of June, when it broke camp and went in pursuit of the rebel army on its raid in Maryland and Pennsylvania. From here to Gettysburg the march was the most severe of any ever performed by the army of the Potomac, the men suffering from fatigue, short rations and excessive heat, many of whom fell out and died by the roadside. When they met the enemy at Gettysburg it was a relief to many to know that they had an opportunity to fight rather than march, and all went forward determined to conquer their foes or die in the attempt.

Early on the morning of the 2d of July the line was formed under command of Captain J. F. Langley. The engagement commenced in the afternoon. The Twelfth was stationed near the center of the line where the enemy made a heavy attack. All through this bloody and decisive battle the regiment fought with great gallantry, fully sustaining the reputation they had won at so heavy cost at Chancellorsville. It went into the fight with twelve officers and two hundred and twelve enlisted men, and lost one officer killed, five wounded; twenty enlisted men killed, sixty-eight wounded. Aggregate loss, ninety-four. Lieut. H. A. L. Fletcher, while gallantly rallying his men, on the 2d, was killed by a bullet shot through the head. There were many instances of individual bravery, to mention any of which would seem to do injustice to others.

The rebel army having retreated, the pursuit again commenced and a long march ensued. At Warrenton, on the 26th of July, the Twelfth was ordered to report to General Marston, at Point Lookout, Maryland. From the 11th of June the regiment had been marching and fighting without rest of a single day. Many of the men had become sick from over exertion, and more than half of the remnant of the regiment were without shoes or stockings, their feet raw from exposure to the sand and sun, and their clothing was literally in rags. It marched through Washington and arrived at Point Lookout on the 31st of July, where it remained guarding rebel prisoners, with the Second and Fifth New Hampshire, until April, 1864. While here the regiment received three hundred and fifty recruits. Four hundred and fifty had been assigned to it, but one hundred deserted on the way to the regiment.

The account of the organization of General Butler's army at Gloucester and Yorktown, and its movements up the James; its taking position at Bermuda Hundred; its fighting at Drury's Bluff, and its expedition in assistance of the Army of the Potomac, at Cold Harbor, has been so fully given in the history of the Second and other regiments as not to require repetition here. At Drury's Bluff the Twelfth was for four days and nights in succession in the front line without being relieved. On the 16th of May a general engagement took place, in which the Twelfth lost two enlisted men killed, and thirty-two wounded. After this battle the regiment encamped at Bermuda Hundred, and was engaged in building the defenses of that place. On the 26th of May the regiment was engaged in a skirmish at Port Walthal, in which two men were mortally wounded. At Cold Harbor, on the 3d of June, the Twelfth, with its brigade, made an advance across an open field upon the enemy's works, in which it lost two officers killed and six wounded; thirty-eight enlisted men killed and one hundred and nineteen wounded. Making an aggregate loss of one hundred and sixty-five, out of less than three hundred taken into the engagement. Many of the wounded were left upon the field between the two lines of works, not more than seventy-five yards apart, for three days, before they could be taken away.—Twenty of the dead of this regiment were found within five yards of the enemy's works. Captain Shackford, who had previously received five wounds, was severely wounded on this occasion.

On the 15th of June the regiment disembarked at Bermuda Hundred, and the same night marched to the front of Petersburg, and on the next day formed a part of the line which carried the works. For seventy-two days the regiment was only relieved from the trenches to take part in the battle of Cemetery Hill, at the explosion of the "Mine," on the 30th of July. During this time three officers were wounded, two enlisted men killed and twenty-nine wounded, while many were lost by sickness caused by the burning heat of the sun by day and the dampness of the trenches by night, in an unhealthy locality.

On the 26th of August the Twelfth was relieved from the front of Petersburg, and moved to the defenses of Bermuda Hundred, where it joined Colonel Potter's reserve brigade. Colonel Potter who was wounded and taken prisoner at Chancellorsville, was exchanged on the 13th of October, 1863, but being unfit for field duty was on detached service until the 2d of September, 1864, when he joined his regiment and was assigned to the command of a provisional brigade.

On the 17th of November the enemy attacked the Union picket line, and in the engagement which ensued the regiment lost one officer wounded and two captured; one enlisted man killed, six wounded and thirty-five captured, two of whom, Sergeant A. W. Batchelder and private Benjamin B. Thompson, escaped from Libby prison on the night of the 7th of December, and in eight days made their way to the Union lines.

In the reorganization of the Tenth and Eighteenth Army Corps, Colonel Potter was assigned to the command of the Second Brigade, Third Division, Twenty-fourth Army Corps. During the winter of 1864-65 the Twelfth Regiment formed a part of the line in front of Richmond. Here they constructed winter quarters which were pronounced by the inspector general to be the best in the Army of the James.

During the night of the 2d of April, 1865, it was evident from indications in front that some unusual movements were going on within the enemy's lines. General Devens, who was in command, gave an order to advance the whole line at the first break of day on the 3d. The enemy's guns were still pointing threateningly toward the Union lines; their tents remained the same as they had been for weeks, and every thing bore the same appearance, yet the Union troops pressed forward, expecting every moment the rebels would open fire upon them from their monster guns. They met with no opposition, however, as they passed line after line of the rebel works, and entered Richmond, the birth-place of treason, about eight o'clock on the morning of the 3d of April, 1865. The Mayor and Council had formally surrendered the city to a squad of the Fourth Massachusetts Cavalry, about thirty minutes before the Twelfth Regiment arrived, in command of Captain H. Q. Sargent. Captain Sargent and his command were the first to take possession of Jeff. Davis' mansion. The rebels had kindled fires in several places and the city was saved from total destruction only through the efforts of Union soldiers.

The regiment remained in the city for several days, performing provost guard duty, when it moved with its brigade across the James river to Manchester, where it remained until May, when it was ordered to Danville, but returned to Manchester, where, with the Tenth and Thirteenth New Hampshire Regiments, it was mustered out of the United States service, on the 21st of June, and with them, under command of General Donohoe, started the next day for home, and arrived at Concord on the 27th. On the 3d of July the men were paid and finally discharged.

For fourteen months before its muster out the regiment had been commanded by Colonel Thomas E. Barker, a most gallant and faithful officer, of whom it should be recorded that during the active campaign of five months he was not absent from his regiment a single day. Chaplain T. L. Ambrose was wounded in front of Petersburg on the 24th of July, and died of his wounds on the 19th of August, 1864. He was one of the most noble, brave and humane men in the army, and by his many acts of kindness and christianity had won the unbounded respect and affection of every man in the regiment. It was said of him that "A braver man never lived; a truer man never wore the garb of christianity." The Twelfth Regiment contributed its share toward the proud record of New Hampshire in the war.

THIRTEENTH REGIMENT.

This regiment was raised under the same call, and about the same time as the four preceding ones, and was like them largely composed of the true hearted, intelligent and patriotic yeomanry and mechanics of the good State of New Hampshire, who appreciated the great struggle in which the country was engaged and the sacrifices they were called upon to make to insure the triumph of the cause of popular liberty. Rockingham, Hillsborough and Strafford Counties each furnished two companies, and Merrimack, Carroll, Grafton and Coos, one each. They went into camp at Concord the fore part of September, and the muster of the regiment into the United States service was completed on the 23d of that month. The following were the field, staff and company officers, with the official record of each, during the term of service of the regiment:

GENERAL AARON FLETCHER STEVENS.

General Stevens was born at Derry, in Rockingham County, New Hampshire, August 9, 1819. When he was quite young his parents removed to Peterborough, in Hillsborough County. After attending the public schools of Derry and Peterborough he received a good academic education, and taught school several terms. In 1838 he removed to Nashua, and pursued a course of study for three years with industry and zeal, calculated to fit him for the active duties of life. In 1842 he commenced the study of law in the office of Hon. George Y. Sawyer, an eminent member of the Hillsborough County bar, and since one of the Justices of the Supreme Judicial Court of New Hampshire. In 1845 he was admitted to the bar and at once entered into copartnership with Mr. Sawyer, soon became known in his own and adjoining counties as an able, industrious and careful practitioner, and with his partner commanded an extensive business. In 1856 Mr. Stevens was appointed by the Governor and Council, Solicitor for Hillsborough County, and performed the responsible duties of the position with faithfulness, ability and success for five years, and until the rebellion broke out. In the prosecution of the large number of criminal cases arising in that county he met the ablest lawyers in the State, sustained himself with credit on all occasions, and took a high and honorable position among his legal brethren. In 1858 Mr. Stevens became a partner of Hon. Aaron W. Sawyer, of Nashua, which arrangement continued until the former entered the army, to aid in the suppression of a most wicked rebellion.

During the existence of the Whig party Mr. Stevens was one of its most active members. In 1849 he was elected to the popular branch of the Legislature from Nashua, and again in 1854, and was one of the most industrious and useful members of that body. He was also elected to the Legislature in 1856 and 1857, taking a leading position on committees, and upon the floor, as an able, earnest and pleasing debater, espousing and maintaining the principles of the Republican party. He was a member of the Whig National Convention at Baltimore, in 1852, which nominated General Winfield Scott as the candidate for President.

When the war of the rebellion broke out, in April, 1861, Mr. Stevens was among the first men in the State to tender his services to the Governor. When the First Regiment was being organized he was tendered and accepted the position of Major of it, and served with that organization until the expiration of its term of enlistment, with credit to himself and the State. When the Thirteenth Regiment was organized, in the autumn of 1862, Major Stevens was commissioned its Colonel, went with it to the field, and followed its fortunes until the end of the war. He distinguished himself for gallantry, courage, coolness and skill as an officer on many bloody fields, and was often commended by his superior officers. In the assault on Fort Harrison, September 29, 1864, Colonel Stevens was in command of a brigade, comprising his own and three New York regiments. He fell severely wounded while at the head of his brigade and within a few yards of the fort, where he remained until the colors of his command were planted upon the parapet of the captured work, and was then carried from the field. For his gallant and meritorious conduct in this and other engagements, Colonel Stevens was appointed Brigadier General United States Volunteers, by brevet, to date from December 8, 1864. General Burnham, commanding the brigade in the attack on Petersburg, June 15, 1864, in his report of the affair to General Brooks, commanding the division, said "I desire particularly to bring to your favorable notice Colonel Aaron F. Stevens, of the Thirteenth New Hampshire Volunteers, both for his personal gallantry in charging the enemy's works on the 15th, and for the able manner in which he handled his regiment on that occasion. To him and to his regiment the success which was achieved is due in a very great measure, and I take pleasure in recommending him for promotion." This recommendation was fully and heartily endorsed by General Brooks in his report to General Smith, commanding the Eighteenth Army Corps. General Stevens' military record is identical with that of the Thirteenth Regiment, and both are in a high degree honorable to the State.

General Stevens was nominated as a candidate for member of Congress from the Second New Hampshire District, in December, 1866, and was elected the following March; and was elected for a second term in March, 1869. He has served on the standing committees on Revolutionary Claims, and Naval Affairs, and as a member of the special committee on the Treatment of Union Prisoners. As at the bar of his own country, in the Legislature of his own State, and in the army for the suppression of the rebellion, so in Congress has General Stevens maintained a high and honorable position, for his industry on committees, his ability in debate, and his wisdom as a statesman.

On the 5th of October, 1862, the Thirteenth Regiment received its colors, at the State House, from the hand of Hon. Allen Tenny, Secretary of State, and on the following day left for Washington, fully armed and equipped. It went into camp near Fort Albany, on the south side of the Potomac, where it remained several weeks, engaged mostly in drill. The regiment arrived at Falmouth, opposite Fredericksburg, Va., on the 9th of December, and was assigned to the First Brigade, commanded by Colonel Hawkins, Third Division, General Getty, of the Ninth Army Corps, then commanded by General O. B. Wilcox.

The Thirteenth crossed the Rappahannock river, with its brigade, on the 11th, and held the lower part of the city. During the greater part of the battle on the 13th, the regiment was protected from the guns of the enemy by a bluff under which it was stationed. About five o'clock in the afternoon General Getty was ordered to attempt with his division what two corps had failed to accomplish, and had been repulsed with terrible slaughter. He was to carry the batteries on Marye's Height—the most formidable position in the enemy's line. The division consisted of but two brigades—Hawkins' and Harland's. The former posted his brigade in two lines. The Thirteenth was on the right of the second line. The order to advance was obeyed promptly. The troops moved across the railroad under a considerable fire from both musketry and artillery, and charged up the steep bank, hoping to carry the works which crowned its crest. It was so dark that the line was considerably confused, and, receiving a terrific volley when within a few rods from the enemy, and the point aimed at, the regiments were broken up and retreated in disorder. The lines of the Tenth and Thirteenth New Hampshire were immediately reformed by their commanders, expecting to renew the attack, but the whole command was soon ordered to retire to the city. The troops recrossed the river on the night of the 15th, and the regiment returned to its old encampment. During the evacuation of the city, and while the remainder of the division retired across the river, the Thirteenth held the Union picket line along the railroad and on both sides of Hazel run. Lively firing was kept up during the night with the enemy's pickets. It was a position of responsibility and peril, and was held by the regiment until three o'clock on the morning of the 16th, when it was relieved and again joined its brigade. In this battle the Thirteenth lost three officers and thirty-nine men killed, wounded and prisoners. Captain Carter and Lieuts. Durell and Shaw were slightly wounded. This was the first time the regiment had met the enemy or been under fire, but it proved the coolness and gallantry of the officers and the bravery of the men.

The Thirteenth shared with the army the cold and snow, the mud and exposure of Falmouth, and suffered severely from sickness of officers and men. It moved with the Ninth Corps to Newport News, in February, 1863, and on the 13th of March, with the division, to Suffolk, where it was actively engaged in the defense of that place against the siege which soon followed, and was under fire most of the time for four weeks.

On the 3d of May a reconnoissance was ordered, and the Thirteenth and three other regiments, with some artillery and cavalry, crossed the Nansemond on the Providence Church road, and in their advance drove in the skirmishers of the enemy, who retired to their rifle-pits in the edge of the woods, where they occupied a line more than half a mile long. Upon this the Thirteenth, with a part of the Eighty-ninth New-York, charged, under command of Colonel Stevens, and carried the works at the point of the bayonet, the killed and wounded of the enemy falling into the hands of the Union troops. The enemy were driven through the woods, and a strong line of intrenchments, heavily garrisoned, unmasked. The artillery opened a sharp fire upon the works, which was briskly replied to, the fight lasting until dark. The same night the enemy withdrew from his position, raised the siege of Suffolk, and retreated toward Blackwater, closely followed by the Union troops, who captured a large number of prisoners. The regiment was particularly complimented for its conduct in this affair. Its loss in killed and wounded was about thirty. Captain Buzzell was killed, and Lieut. Murray severely, and Captain Stoodley slightly, wounded.

During the ensuing summer and fall the regiment was engaged upon the fortifications in the vicinity of Portsmouth, doing an immense amount of labor. It participated in General Dix's expedition to Hanover Junction, in June, suffering much from the exposure and hardship of the march, which was followed after its return to camp, by extraordinary sickness and mortality. Companies B and D were soon after placed in Fort Tillinghast, in the line of defenses, where they remained until the following winter, instructed and exercised in heavy artillery. The regiment passed the winter in comfortable quarters, erected by the men, doing but little severe duty. During the fall and winter the regiment received an accession of two hundred and forty recruits, many of whom were substitutes.

For the campaign of 1864 the regiment was organized with the Second Brigade and First Division of the Eighteenth Army Corps. The brigade was composed of the Tenth and Thirteenth New Hampshire, Eighth Connecticut, and Hundred and Eighteenth New York, under command of Brigadier General Hiram Burnham, formerly colonel of the Sixth Maine. The Eighteenth Corps was under command of Major General W. F. Smith. From Yorktown the corps moved up the James river, landed at Bermuda Hundred, and on the 7th of May the Thirteenth was engaged with the enemy on the Walthal railroad; and on the 9th and 10th fought them at Swift creek, near Petersburg, driving them across the creek, and losing in these operations several men killed and wounded. On the 12th it again met the enemy on the Richmond and Petersburg turnpike, drove them toward Richmond, capturing several prisoners; on the 13th and 14th drove them across Kingsland creek from their rifle-pits and intrenchments, and capturing their outer line of works at Drury's Bluff. The regiment was constantly under fire, a portion of it being night and day on the skirmish line, with the remainder in support. The position in the captured works assigned to the Thirteenth, being on the extreme left of the brigade, with the Tenth New Hampshire joining it on the right, was held until the morning of the 16th, when Beauregard, with thirty thousand troops, in the dense fog, attacked General Butler's line, and surprised and routed General Heckman's command on the right, forcing it back. The attack commenced about four o'clock, but the tenth and Thirteenth were under arms and prepared to receive the enemy. The day previous General Burnham had caused wires to be stretched along the front of his command, fastened to stumps, and about a foot from the ground. The rebels made a fierce attack on the skirmishers in front of the two New Hampshire Regiments, and forced them to retire; but they were soon rallied, and their line reformed and held, until the enemy, being re-enforced, massed his troops directly in front of the Thirteenth, and advanced to the assault of its position, in three lines, forcing the skirmishers to retire to the main body. The enemy emerged from the woods and moved forward evenly under a hot and deliberate fire. When the enemy reached the wire his lines were entirely broken, when some fled and others threw down their arms. Each successive line was broken as soon as it reached the wire, and met the same fate as the first. The attack was handsomely repulsed by the Thirteenth, aided by the oblique fire of the Tenth. The enemy made two like attempts to carry the position, but were each time repulsed with heavy loss. The Thirteenth took fifty-nine prisoners, principally from the Forty-fourth Tennessee and North Carolina regiments, including the Adjutant General of Bushrod Johnson. About nine o'clock peremptory orders were received from the division commander to retire, the right and left of the line having fallen back, and they were reluctantly obeyed. The loss of the regiment in these operations toward Petersburg and Richmond, was thirty-one killed, wounded and prisoners. Lieut. R. R. Thompson was wounded severely while on the picket line.

The regiment with its corps arrived at Cold Harbor on the 1st of June, and on the afternoon of that day engaged the enemy, advancing under a terrific fire of artillery and musketry, gaining and holding an advanced position commanding the enemy's works. The Thirteenth was in front of its brigade, and lost heavily—sixty officers and men having fallen in less than five minutes. Colonel Stevens and Captain Goss were slightly, and Captain Farr and Lieut. Staniels, severely wounded. On the 3d, the day of the main battle at Cold Harbor, the regiment was in front of and near the enemy's lines and under fire, suffering severely, but was not ordered to attack. Lieut. George H. Taggard was severely wounded, and Lieut. J. M. Durell received a slight wound in the neck. In subsequent operations at Cold Harbor the regiment was constantly on duty at the front, losing several men, among whom was Captain Julian, slightly wounded. The total casualties of the regiment at Cold Harbor were: officers wounded, six; men killed, fourteen; wounded and prisoners, sixty-four; total eighty-four.

ATTACK ON PETERSBURG.

On the 15th of June, in an attack upon Petersburg, the Thirteenth, under Colonel Stevens, covered the front of its whole division, and behaved so bravely as to call forth, in the reports of the generals commanding the brigade and division especial commendation. General Burnham, in his report, said: "I threw my skirmishers forward, and assaulting their line, advancing on the double-quick, under a severe musketry and artillery fire. My line dashed across the open field to the enemy's 'French rifle-pits,' which they captured with the entire force that occupied them. Nearly a hundred prisoners were captured here and were hastily sent to the rear, a portion of them guarded by men from the Thirteenth New Hampshire, while others were probably driven to the rear without any guard whatever. Colonel Stevens then moved the line forward, and still encountering a severe fire, they dashed across the open plain, through the ravine and up to the enemy's formidable works, assaulting and capturing battery No. 5 in a gallant manner. Captains E. W. Goss, George N. Julian and N. D. Stoodley, of the Thirteenth New Hampshire, were among the first to enter the battery, and to them the officers commanding it surrendered. Lieut. Colonel Council, of the Twenty-sixth Virginia regiment, Major Beatty, and another Major, name unknown, surrendered their swords to Captain Julian, while Captain Sturtevant, commanding the field battery which was captured, surrendered his sword to Captain Stoodley. The Thirteenth captured in this work one color, five pieces of artillery and about one hundred prisoners. The number of prisoners captured in the whole affair could not have been less than two hundred." Immediately after the fort was entered by the Thirteenth, the captured guns, were, by order of Colonel Stevens, turned and fired on the retreating enemy. The loss of the regiment was heavy. Captain E. E. Dodge, a gallant officer, fell mortally wounded before the works were reached, and died in hospital seven days after. Adjutant Boutwell and Lieut. Gafney were dangerously wounded in front of, and near the works, while gallantly pressing forward in the assault. The whole number of killed and wounded, in the operations of the day, was forty-nine, the regiment going into action with fifteen officers and one hundred and eighty-nine muskets. Two rebel flags, one taken by Sergeant James R. Morrison, of Company K, the other by Corporal Peter Mitchell, of the same company, were sent by Colonel Stevens to the Governor of New Hampshire.

The Thirteenth remained in front of Petersburg until the 27th of August. At the explosion of the "Mine," on the 30th of July, the brigade held the outer position of the Union works in front of the "crater" for two days after the other troops had retired. On the 25th of July the regiment was transferred to the First Brigade of the division, and Colonel Stevens was assigned to its command, which he retained until the assault on Fort Harrison, on the 29th of September. This was a formidable work in the enemy's line, at Chapin's Farm, half a mile from the north bank of the James river, and about six miles from Richmond. To the First Division, commanded by Brigadier General Stannard, of Vermont, was assigned the duty of assaulting and capturing this work. The division came upon the enemy's pickets at daylight on the morning of the 29th, and skirmishing at once commenced. The details of this engagement have been given in the history of the Tenth Regiment.

On the next day, the 30th, the enemy attempted to retake the fort, making four assaults upon the lines established by the Union troops, but was each time repulsed with terrible slaughter. In these assaults the Thirteenth received the enemy in open ground. Of their part in these operations, the official report of Lieut. Colonel Smith, gives the following account: "On the morning of the 30th the regiment was again moved into the fort and placed at work on the left, where we were when it was found the enemy were massing on the right, when we were moved to the extreme right of the fort, our right resting on the intrenchments. About twenty minutes afterward the enemy made the attack. The regiment was almost entirely unprotected during the engagement, but never flinched, and kept up a destructive fire upon the advancing enemy, who were repulsed in every attempt to recapture the fort. After the repulse of the enemy, Captain Goss, Company I, commanding sharpshooters, captured the colors of three regiments of Clingman's brigade, with several prisoners."

The conduct of the officers and men of the Thirteenth on these two days was superb. But again its loss was severe. More than one-half the command which left camp on the night of the 28th, had melted away under the fire of the enemy. Two officers and thirteen men were killed, and seven officers and fifty-nine men wounded. Captain Forbush and Lieut. R. R. Thompson, both brave officers, were killed in the assault and capture of the fort. Colonel Stevens fell severely wounded in the assault, while at the head of his regiment and brigade, and within a few yards of the fort. Lieut. Colonel Smith, Captains Saunders and Bruce, and Lieuts. Ladd, Hall and Wheeler, were wounded.

The Thirteenth was assigned as a part of the garrison to Fort Harrison, now called Fort Burnham, in honor of General Burnham, who lost his life in its capture. It participated with its division in the movement to the Williamsburg road, on the 27th of October, but was held in reserve, and its list of casualties was small. It returned to Fort Harrison the next day. In the re-organization of the Army of the James, in December, the Thirteenth was assigned to the First Brigade of the Third Division of the Twenty-fourth Corps, with which it served until its muster out of the service. During the winter furlough prizes were offered to the best soldier in each division. Sergeant Shattuck, of Company B, Thirteenth New Hampshire, received the first furlough granted, in a division of over six thousand men, and during the winter the regiment carried off a very large portion of the furlough prizes.

The Thirteenth Regiment participated in the final movement upon Richmond, on the 3d of April, 1865. General Devens, commanding the division, in a complimentary letter to Governor Smyth, of this State, dated at Richmond, June 22, 1865, speaking of the Tenth, Twelfth and Thirteenth regiments, says: "On the formation of the Twenty-fourth Corps, all these regiments formed a part of the Third Division, to which they have until now belonged, and were of the first column that entered Richmond on the morning of April 3d, 1865, the Thirteenth New Hampshire being the first regiment of the army whose colors were brought into the city." The Thirteenth was mustered out of the United States service on the 22d of June, and came home with the Tenth and Twelfth, under command of Brevet Brigadier General Donohoe. Arrived at Nashua, the officers of the brigade assembled at the Indian Head House and Captain George A. Bruce, of the Thirteenth, upon the staff of General Donohoe, in their behalf, presented General Aaron F. Stevens, their old and esteemed commander, a saber, sash and belt, suitable to his rank. The General accepted the gift in a handsome and feeling speech, after which he reviewed the brigade, and it appeared so well as to receive the warmest encomiums of thousands of spectators who witnessed it.

Fredericksburg, December 13, 1862.

Siege of Suffolk, April and May, 1863.

Walthal Road, May 7, 1864.

Swift Creek, May 9 and 10, 1864.

Kingsland Creek, May 12 and 13, 1864.

Drury's Bluff, May 14 and 16, 1864.

Cold Harbor, June 1 and 3, 1864.

Battery 5, Petersburg, June 15, 1864.

Battery Harrison, September 29 and 30, 1864.

The regiment was paid off and finally discharged at Concord on the 1st of July, 1865. Its record while in the service is a better commendation than words.

FOURTEENTH REGIMENT.

The Fourteenth was the last of the three years' regiments raised in New Hampshire. Like those which had preceded it, this regiment was composed of the intelligent and patriotic young men of the State, who enlisted from a sense of duty to the country. It was filled mostly with residents of the four western counties. Cheshire County furnished four companies, while Sullivan, Grafton, Coos, Carroll, Merrimack and Hillsborough Counties furnished one Company each. The regiment was organized at Concord, and its muster into the United States service was completed on the 24th of September, 1862. The following were its field, staff and company officers, with the official record of each:

COLONEL ROBERT WILSON.

Colonel Robert Wilson was born at Peterborough, Hillsborough County, New Hampshire, September 24th, 1811. His father, Hon. James Wilson, a lawyer of considerable distinction, removed to Keene in November, 1814. Colonel Wilson graduated at Amherst College, Massachusetts, in 1832. He was commissioned Captain of the Keene Light Infantry in September, 1833, soon after the visit of that company to Concord to receive General Andrew Jackson. In 1836 and 1837 he commanded the Twentieth Regiment, New Hampshire Militia, and was then Division Inspector, under his brother, James Wilson, who was Major General of the Third Division. In 1847 he again took command of the Keene Light Infantry for a season, to assist in resuscitating it. Early in the summer of 1861 Colonel Wilson was offered the command of one of the regiments being raised in New Hampshire for the war, but was unable, for private reasons, to accept it. In August, 1862, he notified the Governor that if he would give him a full regiment he would go into the service. The reply was a Colonel's commission for the Fourteenth Regiment, which was to be the last of the three years' regiments sent from the State, and which was expected to be a very large one. At one time the returns from the different enlisting officers showed a list of nineteen hundred men awaiting orders. When they reported at Concord there was such an avalanche of men, with no arms and no equipments ready to furnish them, that many enlisting officers were permitted to tear up their papers and let the men go without being called upon. Indeed so late as October, 1862, there were thousands of men throughout the country, enlisted and organized into regiments and doing duty with clubs, awaiting clothing and arms, but the government had none to furnish. Rather than go to Washington without arms, Colonel Wilson picked out of a lot of old state arms enough flint lock guns, altered into percussions, to arm one thousand men. These were very inferior guns, more dangerous to the men bearing them than to the enemy. It was not until June, 1863, that they were replaced by Springfield rifled muskets. Colonel Wilson continued in command of the Fourteenth Regiment, being very careful of the health and comfort of his men, and enjoying their respect and confidence, until the early part of September, 1864, when, on account of ill health, induced by the climate and the exposure of camp life, he resigned, and was honorably discharged. Colonel Wilson was elected a member from Keene of the popular branch of the New Hampshire Legislature in 1868 and 1869, and was both years chairman of the standing committee on Military Affairs.

COLONEL ALEXANDER GARDINER.

Colonel Gardiner was born in the State of New York in 1833; graduated at Kimball Union Academy, Meriden, New Hampshire; studied law and was admitted to the bar in New York City, when twenty-two years old, and soon after went to Kansas, with the intention of establishing himself in his professional business, and to assist in publishing a newspaper. His printing office was destroyed by the border ruffians, and the newspaper was abandoned. For a time he engaged in the border war, but on account of failing health returned home, and in the spring of 1859 opened an office and commenced the practice of law at Claremont, New Hampshire, which he continued until the summer of 1862, when he was commissioned Adjutant of the Fourteenth Regiment. Colonel Robert Wilson, who commanded the regiment from its organization until the 6th of September, 1864, when he resigned, wrote of Colonel Gardiner: "In September Adjutant Gardiner was promoted to Major, on my recommendation as the man best fitted for the position, by education, talent and gentlemanly bearing. After we reached New Orleans, in April, 1864, Major Gardiner was in command of the regiment much of the time. On the 13th of July we sailed from New Orleans, leaving Major Gardiner with four companies behind. I only met him again in the valley of the Shenandoah, at Berryville, on the 19th of August. On the night of the 21st, the army was withdrawn from its position in front of the enemy near Charlestown, Va. The withdrawal of the pickets fell upon Major Gardiner as officer of the day. It was a delicate duty to perform, in the immediate face of the enemy, but was accomplished by him successfully. The lines had not been evacuated more than ten minutes before the enemy charged over our empty breastworks in full force, showing that they were on the alert for our movements. Major Gardiner was quite a nice man in his dress and personal appearance. He prided himself on wearing the nicest fitting boots in the regiment, and we had many a laugh at the rivalry between Dr. Thayer, Major Gardiner and Adjutant Wright, who all had a weakness toward nice boots. After Gardiner was wounded and left on the ground at the battle of Opequan Creek, his handsome boots attracted the eye of a Johnnie Reb., who despoiled him of them, causing great pain and suffering. But Johnny had only a short lease of the boots, as he was taken prisoner before night and compelled to strip himself of the boots and lug them into camp hung around his neck, himself marching barefooted over the flinty road."

When Colonel Wilson was discharged, Brigadier General Birge, commanding the brigade of which the Fourteenth Regiment formed a part, wrote the Governor of New Hampshire, requesting Major Gardiner's appointment over the Lieut. Colonel, who had held the office from the formation of the regiment. He wrote: "I am informed that Major Gardiner has been constantly on duty with his regiment since its organization.— During the time it has been under my command he has performed the duties of his office with fidelity, ability and zeal, and I believe him well qualified and competent for the rank recommended. In my opinion, his promotion is deserved, and will be for the benefit of the service and the regiment, and creditable to the State which he represents." This recommendation was followed, and Major Gardiner received his commission as Colonel only the day before the battle of Opequan Creek, near Winchester, Va., September 19, 1864, where he was mortally wounded. He died of his wounds on the 8th of the following month. His remains were brought to Claremont and buried with Masonic honors by Hiram Lodge. Prof. E. T. Rowe, of Kimball Union Academy, who had been Colonel Gardiner's teacher, and was for a time chaplain of his regiment, preached an appropriate and impressive sermon, at the town hall, to a large concourse of people. His horse with the empty saddle, followed him to the grave.

Eng^d by G.E. Perine N. York.

Samuel A. Burchard

GENERAL SAMUEL A. DUNCAN.

Brevet Major General Samuel A. Duncan was born at Plainfield, Sullivan County, New Hampshire, June 19, 1836. His parents were Samuel Bell and Ruth Ticknor Duncan. He finished his preparatory college course of study at Kimball Union Academy, in his native village, Meriden, and graduated at Dartmouth College, Hanover, New Hampshire, in 1858, taking the first honors of the class. After graduation he taught a high school two years at Quincy, Massachusetts, and was then called back to Dartmouth College as tutor, where he remained until the summer of 1862. After the terrible reverses of the Union army at the Peninsula, in 1862, Mr. Duncan announced to his friends his resolve to enter the army, and said he would go as a private, if necessary. He was soon tendered the position of Major of the Fourteenth Regiment, which he accepted, and was mustered in with the other field officers, in September, 1862.

Major Duncan's regiment was engaged in provost duty at Washington, D. C., in the summer of 1863, when day by day the roar of conflict between the contending hosts of the Union and of the Rebellion, in their northward march toward Gettysburg, was borne upon the wind to his camp, his inactive life became extremely irksome. An opportunity for escape, and more honorable, because more active and dangerous, service opened. The War Department inaugurated the policy of organizing colored troops, and with a view to officering them established a Military Board of which General Casey was President, to examine candidates for appointment. Major Duncan appeared before this Board in July, and passed for "Colonel" in "Class 1," ranking first out of about two hundred examinations then made. On the 16th of September, 1863, he was commissioned Colonel of the Fourth Regiment U. S. Colored Infantry, then organizing in Baltimore. The first parade of this regiment through the streets of Baltimore, soon after, was one of the prominent events in the war annals of that secession city. The streets and buildings along the route of the procession were crowded with curious and with frowning spectators. Contrary to the apprehensions of the War Department the display passed off without any serious disturbance.

On the 1st of October Colonel Duncan was ordered with his regiment to Fortress Monroe, and thence to Yorktown, where it passed the winter—taking part in various expeditions in the Peninsula, prominent among which was General Wistar's attempt on Richmond; the surprise and capture of the enemy's camp at Charles City Court House, and the march to the aid of Kilpatrick in his expedition from the Army of the Potomac against Richmond. In the latter case the telegraphic order from Washington to send a column to support Kilpatrick, reached Yorktown about three o'clock in the afternoon. At four the troops of Colonel Duncan's brigade were on the march, amid a drenching rain and through the pitchy blackness of the pine woods above Williamsburg, and yet they made forty-six miles in twenty-three hours.

In February, 1864, General Butler, then in command of the Department of Virginia and North Carolina, organized a brigade of Colored Troops, consisting of Colonel Duncan's regiment, one from Ohio, and two from Philadelphia, and he was placed in command. It was the Third Brigade of the Colored Division of the Eighteenth Corps. When the campaign of 1864 opened it was one of the very best officered and best drilled brigades in the entire army.

General Smith commanded the Eighteenth Corps, and General Hinks was in command of the Colored Division. In the ascent of the James river on the 5th of May, Colonel Duncan's part of the programme was to land his brigade at City Point, where a desperate defense was anticipated, and preparations made accordingly; but the small garrison surrendered without firing a shot. On the 15th of June General Smith, with the Eighteenth Corps, assaulted the defenses of Petersburg, on which occasion the colored troops showed great dash and courage. After the successful assault in the morning upon the outer and temporary line of works, Colonel Duncan was ordered forward into the general line, and to hold his troops in readiness to charge at any moment. The division, by the withdrawal, after the engagement of the morning of one regiment, had been reduced to five regiments and two batteries, all which, save a single regiment, were under command of Colonel Duncan. General Hinks was seriously injured in the morning by his horse falling into a ditch, and could not afterward appear upon the field, and all the movements were made under the direction of Colonel Duncan—though not the senior colonel—by especial orders from General Hinks, who retained the nominal command. For six hours the troops remained in the line in an exposed position, before the order to charge was given. When it was given the colored troops jumped to their feet, and made as gallant a charge as ever veterans made, capturing six pieces of artillery among the trophies of the day. The casualties during the afternoon exceeded a hundred. To Colonel Duncan belonged much of the credit of the important results of that day's work. Two hours after the fight was over, at ten o'clock in the evening, General Hinks went to Colonel Duncan and thanked him for the part he had taken, and said that for his work he should have the same rank as himself. He at once made the recommendation, which went forward favorably endorsed, but was not afterward heard from.

At the attack on Battery Harrison, on the 29th of September, the colored troops under Colonel Duncan rendered gallant service. He lost two of his staff officers on that day, and was himself severely wounded in the ankle. He was incapacitated for field service for five months. In general orders, dated October 11, 1864, General Butler, in command of the Department of Virginia and North Carolina, said: "In the charge on the enemy's works by the colored division of the Eighteenth Corps at Spring Hill, New Market—better men were never better led—better officers never led better men.

With hardly an exception, officers of colored troops have justified the care with which they have been selected. A few more such gallant charges, and to command colored troops will be the post of honor in the American armies." In this order Colonel Duncan was recommended for promotion.

Colonel Duncan rejoined his command in North Carolina, and participated in the operation against Wilmington; and subsequently, in common with General Terry's forces joined with Sherman in his movements against Raleigh and General Johnston. After the cessation of hostilities, he had local commands in North Carolina, and in the fall and winter of 1865 was in command of the line of forts surrounding Washington and on the northern bank of the Potomac. Colonel Duncan was brevetted Brigadier General for gallantry at New Market Heights, Va., Sept. 29, 1864; and subsequently, upon the recommendation of his commanding officers, while yet in the field, was brevetted Major General of Volunteers. He was mustered out of the service on May 6th, 1866, and was afterward a Special Agent in the War Department. For the last two years he has been a principal Examiner in the United States Pension office.

The Fourteenth Regiment arrived at Washington when no further force was required in the Army of the Potomac, or at Fortress Monroe, and was ordered to report to General Grover, and was assigned to a brigade which consisted of the Thirty-ninth Massachusetts, Fourteenth New Hampshire, Tenth Vermont, and Twenty-third Maine regiments, Infantry, and Tenth Massachusetts Battery. General Grover was soon ordered to other duty, and the command of the brigade devolved upon Colonel P. S. Davis, of the Thirty-ninth Massachusetts regiment. The winter was spent by the brigade in the arduous duty of picketing the river for an extent of forty miles.

In the latter part of April, 1863, the regiment marched to Washington, and went into camp on the north side of the city, at the end of New York Avenue, where it remained until February, 1864. During this time the regiment did provost duty in Washington, the nature of which was responsible and various. It furnished guards for the Old Capitol Prison and Central Guard House, and a number of men for about ten other posts in the city. One company was detached and on duty at the principal landing for steamboats and other vessels from the South. The chief duty of this detachment was the suppression of contraband trade and the arrest of unauthorized travelers. Thus the men were kept perpetually busy.

Early in February the regiment was ordered to Harper's Ferry, and thence to Cumberland, eighty miles further west. They returned to Harper's Ferry, and then to Washington, arriving there on the 25th. Soon after the regiment was ordered to the Department of the Gulf, and after a brief visit to New Hampshire, they sailed from New York for New Orleans, on the 20th of March, on two vessels. On their arrival they were quartered at Camp Parapet, and did miscellaneous duty there, at Carrollton, Jefferson City and along Lake Pontchartrain as far as Pass Manchac, and furnished a large daily detail for labor on the fortifications. On the 7th of June the regiment reported to General Emery at Morganzia, near the mouth of the Red river, and was attached to General Birge's brigade. General Birge was absent and the command devolved on Colonel Robert Wilson, of the Fourteenth, and the command of the regiment upon Major Gardiner. This region was very unhealthy and malarious, and the men soon began to sink under the combined evil influences of a hot and unhealthy climate and improper diet.

On the 13th of July the Fourteenth took transportation for the north, six companies under Colonel Wilson, on one vessel, and the remaining four under Major Gardiner, on another. The regiment was not re-united until the 19th of August, at Berryville, where they joined Sheridan's army. Early in September Colonel Wilson resigned on account of serious failure of health, and Major Gardiner was commissioned Colonel of the regiment.

BATTLE OF WINCHESTER.

On the 19th of September occurred the battle at Opequan Creek, near Winchester, Va., in which the Fourteenth Regiment participated, and suffered the loss of many of its bravest and best officers and men. The army was in position two miles to the westward of the Opequan, in two lines of battle, with the Eighth Corps in reserve. The advance was made at half-past eleven o'clock, Birge's brigade on the right of the first line, and the Fourteenth New Hampshire on the right of the brigade. The rebels were driven from their position in splendid style, the brigades directly opposed to Birge's being completely broken. But it has been said the advance was too impetuous to permit the Union troops to hold the ground, for it brought them close upon a rebel battery which had been shelling them during the advance, and now at short range raked the line with grape and canister. The second line was a long distance in the rear, and the rebels were re-enforced by a division just arrived from Bunker Hill. The order was therefore given to fall back in order, and firing. In falling back the Fourteenth Regiment sustained a heavy loss. Thirteen officers of the twenty-one who went into the fight, and one hundred and thirty men, were killed, wounded or prisoners. Only eight were taken prisoners, and some of these were wounded. Captains Chaffin and Fosgate, and Lieuts. Paull and Fiske were killed. Colonel Gardiner was mortally wounded, and died on the 8th of October. Eight other officers, and over a hundred men were more or less wounded. The second line came up, and the regiments of the first line took their place with them. Irregular firing was kept up while the Eighth Corps was getting into position on the right to turn the left flank of the rebels, and connect with the cavalry who were advancing down the Martinsburg pike. At four o'clock the left of the enemy was completely turned, and the whole army advanced impetuously, driving the rebels beyond Winchester, taking twenty-five hundred prisoners, besides all their wounded, and five pieces of artillery. The command of the regiment devolved on Captain Tolman.

On the 20th of September the army moved after the retreating rebels. On the 22d was fought the brilliant battle of Fisher's Hill, the Fourteenth advancing in splendid style against the breastworks, with the first line of Grover's division. Our army followed the rebels closely for a week, falling upon their rear, until they reached Harrisonburg, eighty miles from Winchester. Captain Ripley was made provost marshal, and the Fourteenth Regiment was detailed for provost duty in the town.

THE BATTLE OF CEDAR CREEK

Occurred on the 19th of October, in which the Fourteenth Regiment behaved so bravely as to win the approbation of General Birge. The battle commenced before sunrise, the rebels under General Early advancing with a heavy force from Fisher's Hill upon the Union army, overwhelming and driving it back in some confusion, by greatly superior numbers. Later in the forenoon the advance of the rebel army was checked, and the Union army held their position. General Sheridan had been in Washington, and reached Winchester that morning. From there he rode with all possible haste, when he heard the artillery from Cedar creek, and reached the army between ten and eleven o'clock. He at once made preparations for recovering the position that had been lost. While the rebels were kept in check by a ceaseless cannonade, the main line of the army was withdrawn and re-formed across the Winchester pike, a mile north of Middletown, confronting the rebel army. Cavalry was on each wing, and the three corps were arranged in one long line of battle between. At three o'clock the line was ordered to advance. They met the rebels securely posted behind stone walls, dislodged them after hard fighting, drove them from wall to wall, from crest to crest; and by sunset had driven them beyond the ground from which the army had been forced in the morning. The cavalry coming in on the right and left, pursued the enemy up the valley to Fisher's Hill, and the next morning followed them to Mount Jackson. The rebel army left every thing in its flight — forty-eight cannon, ambulances, wagons, and five thousand stands of arms. The cavalry brought in two thousand prisoners, which were all they could take care of. The day that opened with disaster, closed with such a victory as is not often seen. The total loss in this engagement was reported as four thousand and eighty-six. The Fourteenth Regiment lost eight killed, fifty-five wounded, and sixteen prisoners. Among those captured was Captain Ripley, who was in command of the regiment. He was taken prisoner soon after sunrise. The command of the regiment fell upon Captain Marston, which he retained until the middle of December, when Captain Tolman was promoted to major. The same month Carroll D. Wright was promoted from Adjutant to Colonel, and assumed command.

The first week in January the division to which the Fourteenth Regiment was attached moved to Savannah, and arrived there about the middle of the month, just as the last corps of Sherman's army was leaving the city, and General Grover assumed command of the district, which included the eastern part of the State. The Fourteenth, with other regiments, was quartered in the city on provost duty. Here the regiment remained until the 6th of May, when they marched to Augusta. While there they guarded Jeff. Davis, and the prisoners taken with him, to the steamer that carried him to Savannah. The regiment was ordered to Savannah early in June, to be mustered out, where it remained a month before transportation was obtained for the north.

In March Colonel Wright and Lieut. Colonel Barker having resigned, Captain O. H. Marston, Company K, was promoted to Lieut. Colonel, and commanded the regiment until it was mustered out. Surgeon William Henry Thayer was appointed medical director of the second division, Nineteenth Corps, in February, and Assistant Surgeon Marshall Perkins had charge of the regiment from that time. Lieut. C. Fred Webster, regimental quartermaster, was detailed as assistant post quartermaster. Captain Ira Berry, Jr., had command of Camp Distribution during the spring. Lieut. M. M. Holmes commanded the camp of colored refugees. Lieut. A. F. Hussey was detailed as assistant street commissioner. Captain George F. Blanchard was assistant adjutant general of the first brigade, after December, 1864. A large number of officers and men were detailed for responsible duties, and the regiment had the reputation of being faithful, brave and reliable, in every position.

The Fourteenth Regiment lost by death above two hundred men and officers. Seventy of these fell in battle, or died of their wounds. The remainder sank under disease brought on in the discharge of their duty, in unhealthy climates, and among them were many valuable and beloved officers.

The Governor and Council caused a suitable monument to be erected near Winchester, Va. It was dedicated on the 9th of April, 1866, with impressive ceremonies, and bears this inscription :

“New Hampshire erects this Monument to the memory of her brave sons of the Fourteenth Regiment, who fell in battle, September 19th, 1864, upon this field, and are here buried in one common grave.”

COLONEL JOHN W. KINGMAN.

Colonel Kingman was born at Barrington, Strafford County, New Hampshire, in 1821. His ancestors, on both sides, were connected with, or descended from Elder William Brewster, of Mayflower memory. He fitted for college at Phillips Exeter Academy, and graduated at Harvard in 1843. He studied law in the office of Daniel Webster, in Boston, and commenced practice in Cincinnati, Ohio; but soon returned to Dover, N. H., where he entered into a partnership with Hon. Daniel M. Christie, and continued in the practice of his profession until the commencement of the war. In October, 1862, he was commissioned Colonel of the Fifteenth Regiment. Its term of service was nominally nine months, but extended from July, 1862, when the companies were raised, until August 13, 1863, when they were mustered out. The time was too short for any regiment to distinguish itself. It, however, bore an important part in the campaign of Port Hudson, and never failed to do all that could reasonably be expected of it. He requested the officers, before leaving New Hampshire, to sign a regimental temperance pledge, to bind them all, during their term of service, to the strictest sobriety; and every officer signed it, and every man of them kept it with commendable integrity. As a natural result, wherever the regiment was stationed, they had the reputation of being the least disorderly regiment in the army. When at Carrollton, near New Orleans, where were thirty-five regiments, the provost marshal told Colonel Kingman that the Fifteenth New Hampshire was the only regiment there that had never had an officer or man arrested by his guard. Colonel Kingman early obtained the confidence and affection of his men, and retained it to the end. On the 27th of May, 1863, in the unsuccessful assault on Port Hudson, the Second Division, of which the Fifteenth Regiment formed a part, commanded by General T. W. Sherman, lost nearly every officer in it, and Colonel Kingman was left in command. It was in this engagement that General Sherman lost a leg, and General Dow was badly wounded. Colonel Kingman enjoyed the intimacy of both these brave officers; but after they left General Banks sent General Dwight—a man not distinguished for courage or sobriety—to command the division. It was intimated that his method of showing his prowess was to order his officers under arrest, and at one time he had nearly all of them deprived of their commands. Colonel Porter, of the Fourteenth Maine, and Colonel Kingman were among the first whose swords he demanded. They were never tried, nor were there any charges preferred against them. General Banks soon removed General Dwight and ordered all the officers back to their commands.

After being mustered out with his regiment, Colonel Kingman made several unsuccessful attempts to again enter the service, having a desire to do his share toward finishing up the rebellion. He returned to civil life and the practice of his profession. In April, 1869, he received from President Grant the appointment of Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the Territory of Wyoming, which office he now holds.

The Fifteenth Regiment was mustered into the United States service on the 12th of November, 1862, and received its colors from the hand of Governor Berry.

On the 13th the regiment left Concord, under orders to report to General N. P. Banks, at New York City, and reached there next morning. The fore part of December the regiment sailed on three different vessels for New Orleans, the last detachment arriving there on the 26th of December, and being reunited went into camp at Carrollton. On the 28th of January, 1863, the regiment moved to Camp Parapet, about two and a half miles from Carrollton. It formed a part of the first brigade, second division, Nineteenth Army Corps. The brigade was composed of the Sixth Michigan, One Hundred and Twenty-eighth New York, Fifteenth New Hampshire, and Twenty-sixth Connecticut, and was commanded by General Neal Dow. The two regiments first named were three years' troops; the two last nine months. Brigadier General T. W. Sherman commanded the division. Here the regiment remained doing camp and guard duty, furnishing details of officers and men for different purposes, and with but few changes in the organization, until the spring of 1863.

On the 20th of May the regiment embarked on board steamers and sailed for Springfield Landing, where it arrived on the 22d and joined its brigade. On the 23d they were joined by the Second Brigade of the division. They moved cautiously through the woods two and a half miles toward Port Hudson; formed in line of battle, advanced a short distance and halted for the night. On the 24th they again moved toward the rebel works, expecting to encounter a rebel force at some earthworks about two miles from their main line of defenses, but found them abandoned. The picket line, supported by Companies D and E, advanced to within about a thousand yards of the enemy's defensive works, consisting of a parapet, seven miles in length, extending from the river below Port Hudson to a bayou above, with outer works commanding all avenues of approach; and a heavy growth of timber had been felled for a distance of half a mile from the parapet. These works were held by upward of eight thousand men, and their position was worth at least twenty thousand more, commanded by Major General Gardner, formerly of the regular army. On the morning of the 25th of May, the Nineteenth Army Corps lay before this rebel stronghold. General Sherman's division consisted of two brigades, General Dow's and General Nicholson's, each numbering about twelve hundred men. General Dow had the right and General Nicholson the left of the division.

On the 26th of May, four companies from the Fifteenth, with detachments from other regiments, went to the front, to burn some buildings occupied by the rebels, which was accomplished without loss to the regiment. At six o'clock, P. M., four companies, A, D, E and K, under Major Aldrich, were ordered to the front, to support the pickets.

On the 27th an assault was ordered along the whole line. The four companies under Major Aldrich, thrown out on the flanks as sharpshooters and skirmishers, did good execution in picking off the rebel artillery men. The other six companies formed a part of the assaulting column of the brigade, commanded by General Dow, and led by Generals Sherman and Dow. The brigade covered the south end of the eastern portion of the enemy's works, and lay in line of battle about three-fourths of a mile from the enemy. The intervening distance was level. Just in front was a long dense belt of woods, some sixty rods in depth; then an opening about forty rods wide and one hundred and fifty long, from right to left; then woods again, between this opening and the enemy. There was a gap in the woods, about forty rods wide, leading direct from this cleared ground to a broad level space, on the further side of which was the earth bank of the enemy. The distance from the line of trees nearest the rebels to their works was about a quarter of a mile. On the right of this front was a deep ravine, with steep, irregular sides, running direct to the enemy's works, forming a right angle at the point of intersection. At one o'clock, P. M., the brigade was drawn up in the first clearing in front of its position. On the extreme left were several batteries of artillery, which played through the gap in the woods upon the rebel works. The forenoon had been passed in sharp skirmishing along the whole length of the lines, the light troops covering themselves with stumps, bushes, and every thing that afforded shelter, had pushed, in many places nearly up to the rebel works. For two days the enemy had not shown himself outside his defenses. The air was filled with minnie balls, cannon shot and shell, which, however, did but little damage to either side. The artillery opened at one o'clock in earnest, and for half an hour thundered upon the enemy. The fire was tremendous, and the enemy replied with an incessant shower of every conceivable missile. Soon a long train of wagons, loaded with bags of cotton, boards, and long poles, for bridging the ditch, and escorted by three hundred negroes, burst through the smoke and hurried to the front. The brigade was awaiting the order to advance. It was soon given, and they went forward at the double-quick, and met a terribly deadly fire from the enemy. As they pressed on over fences and through scattering trees, the men fell in fearful numbers. An attempt was made to correct the alignment which had become broken, but it was found impossible, and the confusion soon became inextricable, so murderous was the fire of the enemy. The bravest hurried to the front, the cowards to the rear; the whole knew not what to do; to retreat was unthought of, and finally the whole brigade was swept away to the right, and went into the ravine. Those in the extreme advance—and the Fifteenth was largely represented there—seeing their support disappear, leaped into the gorge themselves, while their officers hurried back to arouse the middle and rear. General Dow had been wounded and carried from the field. There was no possibility of reforming the brigade; nothing could be done but push on, surmount the parapet, if possible, and attack the enemy in his teeth. A second advance was made, at double-quick, and when in perfect range the enemy opened his fire, concentrated from more than a mile of his works, direct upon the column, but they did not falter. Lieut. Colonel Blair was in command of the advance. As he started the second time he asked General Sherman for instructions. "Lead them ahead, straight ahead, dead on the enemy's works," were the orders he received. The advance was unsuccessful, and the troops were obliged to fall back to the ravine in order to reform. General Sherman, having been severely wounded, was taken from the field by men of the Fifteenth. The command devolved upon Colonel Cowles, of the One Hundred and Twenty-eighth New York, who rallied the men and attempted another advance, which was also unsuccessful. Colonel Cowles ordered a retreat, and fell, mortally wounded, about forty rods outside the enemy's works. There was one more attempt to gain the works. A common soldier came marching along alone, leading a white horse with his right hand, waving the stars and stripes with his left, and calling upon his comrades to rally, and rally they did. The bank of the ravine was instantly alive with soldiers, the parapet was ablaze again, and the men fell fearfully fast; still they pressed on. The center and rear of the column did not waver. The advance hurried forward, was nearing the parapet; it was not ten rods off; here Lieut. Colonel Blair fell, severely wounded in the arm. The brave fellow with the white horse, pressed forward a few steps beyond, and fell, blood streaming from his mouth. The men who rushed forward had nearly all fallen, and with this ended the fight. At night the troops were withdrawn. The loss was very heavy, one fourth of the fighting men of the corps.

On the 13th of June fifty men from the Fifteenth, under Lieuts. Seavey and Perkins, of Company H, with the same number from the Twenty-sixth Connecticut, all commanded by Lieut. Seavey, made a demonstration against the enemy's works. Before advancing they were addressed by Colonel Clark, commanding the brigade, who told them if there was a man among them who feared to die, he then had an opportunity to honorably retire, but that they must choose then or not at all. Not a man of the Fifteenth left the ranks, and but one of the Twenty-sixth Connecticut. They were then deployed as skirmishers and ordered to advance across the scene of the late battle, coolly and steadily, toward the rebel parapet, up to it, and over it. They obeyed their instructions until many of them had fallen, when, not being supported, they laid down, and covering themselves as they could, they fought away until dark. There never was a braver act than the charge of that line of skirmishers. The rebels were struck with admiration, and, after they were well up, issued orders to kill no more such brave fellows, but by a sally to endeavor to capture them. But for this forbearance of the enemy probably not a man could have escaped. The loss of the regiment in this affair was thirteen killed and wounded, or more than one-fourth of the number engaged.

The next day another attack was made upon the enemy's works. Soon after sunrise the Fifteenth commanded by Lieut. Colonel Blair, followed by the Twenty-sixth Connecticut, marched up the road, from a position near the river which had been reached by a circuitous route of six miles, to within seven hundred yards of the rebel works. Here they formed in line of battle and advanced about four hundred yards, under a heavy artillery fire, and came upon a concealed ravine, filled with fallen timber, underbrush and briar vines, which was impassable. There was no path to the right or the left, and after some hesitation the regiments plunged into the gorge. Some struggled through and came up on the other side, but to no purpose. The division remained there during the day, intensely tortured by heat, hunger and thirst, under the fire of the enemy, but the men were so well protected by the underbrush that but few were harmed. At night the command was withdrawn. The loss in the Fifteenth was two officers and twenty-four men wounded. Lieut. Colonel Blair was hit by a minnie ball on the arm previously wounded. Captain J. H. Johnson, of Company D, was prostrated by exertion and heat, and died at his home at Deerfield, on the 14th of October. Colonel Clark, who commanded the brigade on the 14th of June, in his report of the engagement said of the Fifteenth New Hampshire Regiment: "Both officers and men conducted themselves in a manner worthy of American soldiers. The nine months' men have demonstrated, by their gallant conduct, that they can be relied on in any emergency."

The siege of Port Hudson continued, both armies erecting batteries and strengthening their works, for several days, without either molesting the other. At length fire was opened simultaneously from each side, and continued for several days; the rebel guns were dismounted and the rebel flag shot away several times, and finally not raised again, though no breach was made sufficient to warrant an attempt to take the works by storm. After the receipt of the news of the fall of Vicksburg, General Gardner unconditionally surrendered Port Hudson to General Banks.

On the 26th of July the regiment turned over its camp and ordnance stores and started on its way home. It reached Concord on the 8th of August, and was mustered out, paid and discharged on the 13th. When the regiment was mustered out of service, though there were thirty-nine officers and seven hundred and two enlisted men whose names were borne upon the rolls, less than thirty officers, and not four hundred and fifty enlisted men were fit for duty. The siege of Port Hudson and the climate of Louisiana had thus sadly thinned the ranks.

COLONEL JAMES PIKE.

Colonel Pike was born at Salisbury, Massachusetts, in November, 1818; was educated at the Wesleyan University, in Connecticut; is a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, having commenced preaching in 1841, and had been presiding elder. He was elected a member of the Thirty-fourth Congress from the First New Hampshire District, in 1855, and was re-elected for a second term in 1857, and was a member of the Committee on Enrolled Bills. In October, 1862, he was commissioned Colonel of the Sixteenth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and served with it during its term of enlistment. His military record is identical with the history of that regiment. He is a clergyman of considerable ability, stands high with the Methodist denomination; is Presiding Elder of the Dover District of the New Hampshire Conference, and was one of a committee to investigate the affairs of the Methodist Book Concern, of New York.

The Sixteenth Regiment joined the Banks Expedition and sailed from New York on the 6th of December, 1862, on two separate vessels. The first detachment arrived at New Orleans on the 20th, and were joined by the second on the 1st of January, 1863. The regiment remained at Carrollton and in the defenses of New Orleans until the advance on Port Hudson. On the 11th of January Second Lieut. Prescott Jones, of Company E, a beloved young officer, died of disease. On the 17th of March Second Lieut. John S. Baker, of Company F, died of fever. He was one of the most competent and promising line officers in the regiment.

On the 17th of March an advance was made to within six miles of Port Hudson, in which the Sixteenth participated. Three musicians of the regiment were captured by the enemy, while sleeping in a slave cabin belonging to a plantation, the female occupants of the house on which having signaled the rebels.

On the 18th of April the regiment was ordered by General Banks to embark on gunboats and co-operate in an attack upon Fort Burton, at Butte a la Rose, a fort some seventy-five miles beyond Brashear. This fort was situated in a cove on the Alchafalaya river, at a confluence of bayous, and its possession, after the triumphant advance of our army to Opelousas, was of importance, as a protection to the rear of the columns; and immediately after its capture the gunboat Arizona opened communication with Admiral Faragut, on Red river. The Sixteenth, acting as sharpshooters, was distributed among four gunboats. Arrived at Fort Burton, on the 19th, a short engagement took place, and the confederate flag was hauled down, the fort surrendered to the commander of the squadron, who took possession of the works, arsenal and barracks and sent the garrison prisoners to New Orleans. The Sixteenth remained here, a most pestilent location, surrounded by dense forests and impenetrable swamps, six weeks. Disease was contracted from which many of the men subsequently died. The regiment had been in command of the Lieut. Colonel since leaving New Orleans, Colonel Pike having been left there quite out of health. A short time before leaving Fort Burton he arrived and assumed command, which he retained until the muster out of the regiment.

On the 30th of May the regiment received orders from General Banks to join his forces at Port Hudson. Before leaving they burned the barracks surrendered by the rebels, and some other buildings, this having been a shipping point for cotton, sugar, &c., and the guns of the fort were shipped on board transports sent up from Brashear City. The rebel pickets were close upon the retiring troops, and had their stay been prolonged a day later they would have been captured, and they were believed at New Orleans to have been "gobbled up" by the advancing enemy. From Algiers the sick of the regiment were sent to New Orleans, and the main body passed up the river to Springfield Landing, where orders were received for Colonel Pike to report with his command, at the headquarters of General Banks, and the Sixteenth was assigned to guard duty over the arsenal of the besieging army. This disposition of the regiment had been determined on previous to its arrival, on account of telegraphic reports from General Emery, commanding defenses of New Orleans, to General Banks, that there were "only a few skeletons of the Sixteenth New Hampshire left." When the regiment took possession of Butte a la Rose it numbered near six hundred guns; when they reached the headquarters of General Banks before Port Hudson, they could muster but two hundred and sixteen.

At Springfield Landing, which was the depot of supplies for the whole army, a detachment from the Sixteenth encountered a sudden attack of the enemy's cavalry, which, if successful, would have put the entire force investing Port Hudson on "short commons." While before Port Hudson, the regiment was, for weeks, in line from three o'clock in the morning till daylight, in the expectation of an attack by outlying parties of the enemy upon that part of the line of investment.

On the 8th of July Port Hudson surrendered, and on the 10th the Sixteenth was among the last of the forces to enter the works. Here were almost daily burials of the dead of the regiment, until the 1st of August, when it embarked for home, by way of Cairo. At Vicksburg, General Grant, on the personal solicitation of Colonel Pike, ordered his post surgeon to examine the sick of his regiment, with a view to transfer to the fine floating hospital there of all who were unable to bear the journey home, and scores were left, many to be buried by stranger hands. At Cairo similar scenes transpired, and many were left at other places on the route, several of whom never reached home. The regiment reached

Concord on the 14th, and was finally paid and discharged on the 20th. Though this regiment saw but little hard fighting, it suffered as much from disease, induced by exposure and the malaria of southern swamps, as any from New Hampshire had done from all causes combined, in the same length of time.

SEVENTEENTH REGIMENT.

As has been stated in connection with the Fifteenth Regiment, in the autumn of 1862, a call was received by the Governor of the State for nine months' men sufficient to fill three regiments of infantry; and it was determined to apportion this levy between the three congressional districts—the Fifteenth to correspond to the first district; the Sixteenth to correspond to the second district, and the Seventeenth regiment to the third district. The field officers of the respective commands were immediately thereafter commissioned and announced accordingly. It was deemed advisable to fill the regiments in their numerical order, as fast as men were enlisted, without regard to their place of residence. Accordingly those who volunteered with promptitude in the third district were ordered into the Fifteenth and Sixteenth regiments, leaving for the Seventeenth the dilatory levies from all the districts. On the 19th of November the regiment was ordered into camp at Concord. The field and staff officers were: Colonel Henry O. Kent, of Lancaster; Lient. Colonel, Charles H. Long, of Claremont; Major, George H. Bellows, of Walpole; Adjutant, George A. Wainwright, of Hanover; Quartermaster, Edward N. Cummings; Surgeon, James D. Folsom; Assistant Surgeons, Luther C. Bean, Horatio N. Small; Chaplain, George S. Barnes, Sergeant Major, J. W. Perkins; Quartermaster Sergeant, John C. Jenness, of Lancaster, Commissary Sergeant, John P. Dennison, of Lancaster; Hospital Steward, Albra L. Robinson.

Nearly a full company, above the required quota of the town, had volunteered for this regiment in Lancaster, the residence of the Colonel; and the records of the Adjutant General's office show that there were enlisted and mustered into the Seventeenth, and enlisted in the territory originally assigned it, seven hundred and ninety-one men. The unfilled quotas of the third district, at the time of the consolidation of the Seventeenth and Second, with this number, seven hundred and ninety-one, more than reaching the minimum number of men required by the regulations for a complete regimental organization.

The regimental organization was perfected, and the drill, discipline and instruction of the command commenced, and was scrupulously adhered to. In December it was decided to postpone the State draft, and orders were issued to reject all substitutes applying for enlistment on the unfilled quotas. Very few volunteers appeared, and on the 9th of February, 1863, officers and men of the Seventeenth Regiment were furloughed until the 1st of the succeeding April, at which time the command again reported in camp, cheered by the official assurance that the regiment would be at once filled, in order to participate in the spring and summer campaign of 1863.

About this time orders were received by Governor Berry, from the Secretary of War, to consolidate the Seventeenth and Second Regiments, under such regulations as he might prescribe. On the 16th of April, 1863, this order was carried into effect, the officers and non-commissioned officers of the regiment mustered out, and the enlisted men transferred. The order effecting this expressed in emphatic terms the approbation of the civil and military authorities of the soldierly deportment of the regiment from the time of its organization, and the excellent discipline and deportment that had uniformly characterized the command, was remarked on every hand. The failure to fill and forward the Seventeenth Regiment was in no way attributable to its officers, and the circumstances which seemed to make the consolidation advisable were regretted alike by officers and men. The men proved excellent soldiers, and behaved so well at Gettysburg as to elicit a special order of commendation from the colonel of the regiment at the expiration of their term of service.

EIGHTEENTH REGIMENT.

On the 19th of July, 1864, the War Department issued an order calling for five hundred thousand volunteers, and under this call the State authorities commenced recruiting the Eighteenth Regiment. Charles H. Bell, of Exeter, was commissioned Colonel, and James W. Carr, of Manchester, Lieut. Colonel, both of whom resigned before being mustered into the United States service, and their places were filled by the appointment of Thomas L. Livermore, of Milford, and Joseph M. Clough, of New London.

The quota of the State having been filled at the organization of the sixth company, no further companies were raised until the next call for troops, which was made on the 21st of December. The remaining companies were now commenced, and on the 17th of January, 1865, Major Thomas L. Livermore, of the Fifth, who was at the time serving on the staff of Major General Humphries, as assistant inspector general of the Second Corps, was commissioned Colonel. During the months of February, March and April, three of the new companies joined the regiment. Company K, however, was stationed on duty at Galloupe's Island, in Boston harbor, and was never ordered to the front, but was mustered out at that place, on the 6th of May, by order of the War Department. As soon as the tenth company had been mustered into service, Colonel Livermore was also mustered, and joined his regiment on the 8th of April. The following is the list of field, staff and company officers of this regiment, and the official record of each:

The six first companies of the Eighteenth Regiment went to City Point, and were assigned to General Benham's engineer brigade. For several weeks they were employed on the impregnable fortifications which surrounded General Grant's base of supplies, and on a corduroy road built to connect City Point with the Army of the James. On the 10th of December the brigade moved to the front near Petersburg, but returned to its old quarters on the 13th. On the 18th this regiment, with enough from others to make the number up to twelve hundred men, was organized as a provisional brigade, under the command of Lieut. Colonel Clough, who reported, in pursuance of orders, to General Ferrero, commanding defenses of Bermuda Hundred, where in the capacity of engineers they labored nearly two weeks, strengthening the fortifications in the immediate proximity of the enemy. At the expiration of this time the detail returned to City Point.

On the 19th of March the Eighteenth was detached from the engineer brigade and reported to Major General Parke, commanding the Ninth Corps. On the 25th the enemy made his celebrated assault on Fort Steadman, which resulted in its capture. The Eighteenth was engaged in the re-capture of the fort, and was then assigned to the first division of the corps, commanded by General Wilcox, and by him assigned to the third brigade, and placed in Fort Steadman, a position, which, owing to its proximity to the rebel lines, was both important and dangerous. A constant fire was kept up by the pickets on both sides, and artillery duels were of frequent occurrence.

On the night of the 29th the enemy again attacked the fort, and a short engagement followed, with a heavy fire of both musketry and artillery on both sides. The rebels were, however, quickly repulsed by the Eighteenth. Major Brown, who was much respected and loved, was killed in the action. Lieut. Colonel Clough was slightly wounded; several enlisted men were killed and wounded, though the casualties were rendered light by the protection of the works.

On the morning of the 2d of April, the Ninth Corps, holding the works directly in front of Petersburg, General Wilcox's division was ordered to assault the works, and while the proper disposition of the troops was being made, Captain W. S. Greenough and several men of the Eighteenth were severely wounded. The order for attack was countermanded. In a skirmish in the afternoon the regiment lost one man killed, three dangerously and several slightly wounded. On the 3d, the Eighteenth, with its division, entered the city of Petersburg. On the 5th the Ninth Corps moved to the South Side Railroad. The first division remained near Ford's Station until the 20th. While here Colonel Livermore joined the regiment and assumed command. The regiment was ordered to Alexandria, where it arrived on the 26th, and thence marched through Washington and went into camp on Georgetown Heights. It was on guard duty in Washington during the trial of the assassins of President Lincoln.

On the 10th of June the original six companies which had been first mustered into service, were mustered out, and arrived in Concord on the 13th, where they were at once discharged. Company K had already been discharged at Galloupe's Island. The remaining three companies were put on provost guard duty in Georgetown, under command of Major Potter, Colonel Livermore and Lieut. Colonel Clough having been detailed on a general court-marshal. On the 15th Colonel Livermore was assigned to the command of the third brigade of the division, and on the 23d both he and Major Potter were mustered out of service, leaving the remnant of the regiment in command of Lieut. Colonel Clough. On the 29th of July these too were mustered out of service, and arrived in Concord on the 2d of August, receiving final discharge and pay on the 8th.

By order of the War Department, the names of the following engagements were placed upon the colors of the regiment:

Fort Steadman, March 25, 1865.

Attack on Petersburg, April 2, 1865.

Capture of Petersburg, April 3, 1865.

FIRST NEW HAMPSHIRE CAVALRY.

The First Regiment of New Hampshire Cavalry was raised in the spring of 1864. Four companies of the regiment were veteran companies of the First Rhode Island Cavalry, but raised in New Hampshire in the fall of 1861. The Governors of the six New England States were authorized by the War Department to raise a regiment, to be called the First New England Cavalry, to be composed of twelve companies—two from each State. All the States except New Hampshire and Rhode Island, subsequently raised each a full regiment, while New Hampshire raised four, and Rhode Island eight companies. These twelve companies were united and formed the New England Cavalry. The four New Hampshire companies formed a battalion, commanded by Major David B. Nelson, of Manchester. It was mustered into the United States service at Concord in the fall and winter of 1861, where it remained until the 22d of December, when it was ordered to Pawtucket, Rhode Island, where it joined the other companies of the regiment, and went into camp. The following were the field, staff and company officers of this battalion, with the official record of each:

On the 14th of March, 1862, the regiment was ordered to Washington, where it joined the Army of the Potomac. While at Washington the name of the regiment was changed from the First New England Cavalry to the First Rhode Island Cavalry, thus, so far as the name might indicate, cutting the four New Hampshire companies off from all identity with their State. This was a severe blow to the men from which they never fully recovered while they remained with that organization. As a consequence of this change of name the Governor of New Hampshire refused to send the battalion recruits when needed to fill its ranks.

In May the New Hampshire battalion was ordered to Fredericksburg to report to General Shields, thus separating them from the Rhode Island portion of the regiment. This was highly satisfactory to the New Hampshire men. On the 30th of May, in a charge upon the retreating column of the enemy, who were burning bridges after them, the battalion showed great dash and courage. The enemy's cavalry, which attempted to act as a rear guard, ingloriously rode down their own infantry and escaped. Coming upon the enemy's infantry some were sabered, but most surrendered as soon as they were reached. The enemy made a stand at a narrow gorge, with a brook running through it, the bridge over which could only be crossed by file, and so posted themselves that they had complete range of the brook. Captain Ainsworth and about a dozen men boldly dashed down the hill to cross the bridge. They were all either killed or seriously wounded. Captain Ainsworth and seven men were killed, and ten were more or less seriously wounded. There were captured from the enemy more than one hundred and fifty officers and men, besides baggage wagons, horses, stores, and implements of war of all kinds in great numbers. Only the cavalry and a small remnant of a regiment of infantry escaped. This was the battalion's first engagement, and was such a victory as surprised even those who had accomplished it. Immediately after the action at Front Royal Major Nelson resigned, and the command devolved on Captain Thompson. The battalion was rejoined by the rest of the regiment on the first of June.

The regiment was at Bull Run on the 29th of August, and took part in the second battle there on the 30th. When the retreat commenced it took the rear and saved the army. The regiment participated in the battle of Chantilly, on the 1st of September, and had almost daily skirmishes with the enemy all through General Pope's campaign. A picket post, stationed at Mountville, five miles from any support, composed of part of Companies I and M, under command of Captain Gove, was attacked October 31, by a whole brigade of cavalry under General Stuart, and a large number killed and captured. Captain Gove and several men were killed, and Lieut. Andrews and about twenty-five men were captured.

When general Hooker assumed command of the army, the cavalry was organized in one corps, under command of General Stoneman. The battle of Kelley's Ford was perhaps the first real cavalry battle of the war. The enemy charged that part of the line where the First Rhode Island Cavalry was posted. The charge was brilliantly executed, but promptly met and repulsed. There was a short but severe conflict, and the enemy retreated, leaving many prisoners in the hands of the Union troops. The regiment took part in the celebrated Stoneman raid, and with that exception remained in camp near Falmouth until the 25th of March, 1863.

In June the regiment, numbering but about three hundred men—the New Hampshire battalion about one hundred—while in camp in a grove near Middleburg, on the road from Fairfax Court House to the Blue Ridge, was surrounded by a strong force of the enemy. They must surrender or fight, and they determined upon the latter. They charged through the enemy's line, but many were killed and captured. That night there were not fifty men together belonging to the First Rhode Island Cavalry, except in the hands of the enemy. Subsequently a few men found their way to headquarters, but New Hampshire was represented by less than thirty men. General Duffie, who had been in command of the regiment about a year, was promoted to Brigadier General, and was succeeded by Lieut. Colonel Thompson. The sick and those who were on detached service returned, and in July the regiment numbered about two hundred and fifty effective men. During the autumn it was engaged in the battles of Auburn and Bristoe Station, and in all the operations of the Army of the Potomac.

FIRST NEW HAMPSHIRE CAVALRY.

In January, 1864, the New Hampshire battalion was detached from the regiment, with a view to forming a new regiment exclusively of New Hampshire men. Nearly all the men re-enlisted, and in February left the army for home on their veteran furlough, and to form the First New Hampshire Cavalry. Before the close of April the four old companies had been filled to the maximum, and three new ones had been completed and mustered into service, and proceeded to Washington, where they arrived on the 25th. The regiment was not completed until July, when the five remaining companies were sent to Washington. The regimental organization was as follows:

The First New Hampshire Cavalry was attached to the third division of the cavalry corps, General Wilson commanding. In an engagement near White Oak Swamp, on the 13th of June, 1864, Lieut. Campbell and several men were killed, and many wounded. For the conduct of the regiment on this occasion, and in covering the movement of the army across the James, it was highly commended by the lieutenant general commanding.

WILSON'S RAID.

On the morning of the 21st of June, at an early hour, the cavalry were ordered to prepare for a long march. The regiment with its division was joined at Jerusalem Plank Road by General Kautz's cavalry command from the Army of the James, the whole under command of General Wilson; a force of nine thousand sabers, twelve guns, and six mounted howitzers. The command crossed the Weldon Railroad at Ream's Station, destroyed the track for several miles, and then moved rapidly to the South Side Railroad, where they burned bridges and destroyed several miles of track. Near Nottaway Court House they were attacked by a cavalry division of the enemy under Fitz Hugh Lee, and after a severe fight, killing and wounding more than one hundred and fifty of the enemy, they retreated in confusion. At Stony Creek Station, on the Weldon Railroad, they met a largely superior force of the enemy, consisting of infantry cavalry and artillery, which had been detached from Lee's army for the purpose of intercepting them.

Wilson's command retired to Ream's Station, where the enemy was met in still larger force, and it became evident that the design was to capture the whole party, which had destroyed their railroad. So perilous had the position of the command become that General Wilson determined to abandon his wounded, destroy his caissons, limbers, and ammunition wagons, and attempt to cut his way through. After a desperate fight a portion of the command escaped, but the enemy captured all the artillery and compelled the retreat of the remainder of the cavalry. Arriving at City Point, orders were issued to dismount all the cavalry regiments recruited since a certain date, which included this regiment, and convert them into infantry; but on the representation by General Wilson of its good discipline and effectiveness, the First New Hampshire was excepted. This famous raid was seldom equalled during the war, either in its hardships or results. Eighty miles of railroad track, four locomotives, two trains of cars, large quantities of tobacco and cotton were destroyed, twenty-five hundred contrabands and a great number of horses and mules brought into the Union lines, and the communication of Lee's army with the south completely cut off for a month. In this raid the regiment suffered a loss of one officer and seventy men, killed, wounded or missing.

All through the summer and fall of 1864 the New Hampshire Cavalry was continually active in co-operating with the Army of the Potomac, with its division, by itself and by detachments, on raids, skirmishing and performing long, hasty, and tedious marches to points where its services were required—gaining for itself a high reputation for discipline and efficiency, and reflecting honor upon the State.

The army lay at Winchester, in winter quarters, until the last of February, 1865, little of importance occurring. On the 18th of December, in an expedition up the valley, the division was attacked at night, and in the confusion Lieut. Colonel Hutchins and several others were captured. Later in the winter fifty picked men, under Lieuts. Palmer and Jones, took part in the raid which resulted in the capture of Harry Gilmor, the noted guerrilla.

On the 26th of February General Sheridan, with the two divisions of Cavalry commanded respectively by Generals Custar and Merritt, started on the raid on which he reached Richmond, after capturing the remnants of Early's army, and destroying railroads and the James River canal. The Twenty-second New York was joined with the First New Hampshire, under command of Colonel Thompson, both regiments being reduced in numbers, and acting as a single regiment. On the fourth day the command reached Waynesborough, a small village about twelve miles south of Staunton, on the railroad leading to Gordonsville. The enemy was found strongly posted on the ridge at the entrance to the village, in rifle-pits, and having many guns in position in earthworks. Two regiments were dismounted and sent to make a demonstration on the enemy's left, while the First New Hampshire and two others were kept in front, mounted for a charge. At the signal for the charge Colonel Thompson's command took the front, followed by the Eighth New York and First Vermont. The men rode up to the rifle-pits, leaped their horses over the works, and with their sabers alone captured about fifteen hundred prisoners, all the artillery, wagons, other property, and the colors of every regiment and detachment engaged. The rebel army was entirely demolished. The prisoners were taken to Winchester by Colonel Thompson, with a guard of seven small regiments, including the First New Hampshire Cavalry, numbering about six hundred, and a few dismounted men. This was a responsible duty, his rear being continually threatened and several times attacked by the enemy. It was accomplished, however, without the loss of a prisoner, but on the contrary having materially increased their number by captures.

The five companies unorganized when the seven first ones left the State, were largely composed of substitutes, and others who enlisted for the heavy bounties offered, many of whom deserted on the way and after reaching the regiment. They did not join the regiment until March, 1865, but were kept on detached duty. The regiment was mustered out of service on the 29th of June, arrived at Concord on the 16th of July, and on the 21st was paid and discharged.

On the 1st of November this company proceeded to Washington, completely armed and equipped as a six gun battery. It was assigned to the first Division of the Army of the Potomac, Major General McDowell commanding, and moved to Munson's Hill, Virginia. The Battery was with its division in the advance upon Manassas, on the 10th of March, 1862, and occupied the City of Fredericksburg on the 18th of April. On the 9th of August it marched with its division to join General Pope at Culpeper Court House, and arrived at Cedar Mountain on the 11th, two days after the battle at that place. On the retreat of General Pope's command, the Battery was engaged with the enemy at Rappahannock station on the 22d of August, at Sulphur Springs on the 26th, and reached the battle ground of Bull Run on the 29th. Toward evening a reconnoitering force, consisting of the brigade of General Hatch, the First New Hampshire Battery and a few cavalry troops was sent down the Warrenton road; met the enemy in force near Groveton, and after a short but severe engagement was repulsed. The Battery lost in this action two men killed; Lieut. Wadleigh and several men severely wounded; Captain Gerrish and ten men taken prisoners, and one gun captured by the enemy.

The Battery was engaged in the action at Antietam on the 17th of September, in the corps of General Hooker. It commenced the action on the extreme right, at daylight, and rendered efficient service in different parts of the field during the entire day. It had only a few men wounded and a few horses killed and disabled. Captain Gerrish and Lieut. Wadleigh rejoined the Battery on the 5th of November, and it proceeded to Aqua Creek, Va. It took active part in the battle of Fredericksburg, on the 13th of December. It moved to its position in the line of battle, which was on the extreme left of Reynolds' Corps of Franklin's Grand Division, early in the morning. Here it soon became engaged with the batteries of the enemy, and continued fighting until dark. It lost three men killed, fifteen wounded, and about twenty horses killed and disabled. Captain Gerrish, then acting Chief of Artillery of First Division, was wounded early in the action and taken from the field. A few days later it went into winter quarters at Pratt's Landing, on Potomac Creek.

In March, 1863, Captain Gerrish, being still disabled by his wound, resigned his command. The Battery moved with its corps toward the Rappahannock, below Fredericksburg, and was there engaged with the enemy on the 29th and 30th of April and 2d of May. It was afterward engaged at Chancellorsville, on the 4th and 5th of May, sustaining small loss. In May it was transferred from the First Corps to the Artillery Reserve. The Battery with the Reserve Artillery, arrived at Gettysburg early on the morning of the 2d of July, and was put in position on Cemetery Hill, which post it maintained until noon on the 4th, doing excellent service, especially in assisting to repel the furious assaults of the enemy on the 3d. Although exposed for many hours to a destructive fire, it had but three men wounded, and sustained but a small loss in horses and material.

On the 15th of October the battery was assigned to the Third Army Corps, and joined the command at Union Mills on the same day. On the 8th of November it was engaged in a sharp skirmish with the enemy at Brandy Station, and again at Mine Run on the 30th. It subsequently went into winter quarters at Brandy Station.

In the Spring of 1864, the Battery was assigned to the Second Army Corps, Major General Hancock commanding, and joined it at Stevensburg, Va., on the 19th of April. It was engaged with the enemy at the battle of the Wilderness, on the 6th of May, and with the Sixth Maine Battery, was posted in one of the few places accessible to artillery, and withstood the shock of the charging columns of Longstreet's Corps, and drove back the enemy with severe loss. It sustained no loss except a few horses killed and disabled. It was engaged at Po River on the 9th, 10th and 11th, where one officer and two men were severely wounded, others slightly, and four or five horses killed or disabled. It was engaged at Spottsylvania, fighting on the 14th and 18th of May, without loss. At North Anna River on the 23d, it supported the advance of Birney's Division, which succeeded in carrying the bridge and in effecting a crossing.

At Cold Harbor the battery fought again on the 3d and 5th of June, having two men wounded and two horses killed. It arrived at Petersburg on the 16th and was immediately placed in position for battle, and during this and the succeeding four days was sharply engaged, having two men severely wounded. Up to the 30th of June, in the campaign of that year, it had marched one hundred and fifty miles, and been eighteen days engaged in action with the enemy.

On the 27th of July, at Deep Bottom, the Battery engaged a battery of the enemy which was greatly annoying the Union troops, and in less than thirty minutes the hostile battery was completely silenced, its men driven from their guns, and one of its limbers exploded. The only loss to the New Hampshire Battery was two horses killed, and a caisson disabled. It again returned to the front of Petersburg, arriving there on the morning of the 30th, ready to take part in the assault of that day. From the 20th to the 30th of August it was almost every day engaged, during which time it lost one man killed and two severely wounded by the enemy's sharpshooters. It was now removed to Fort Hill, where it remained until the 7th of September, and was then placed on the front line of Battery No. 13, where it remained until the 22d of October, being almost constantly engaged. From July 1st to October 22d, the Battery had been twenty days engaged with the enemy.

On the 25th of September, its first term of enlistment having expired, fifty-nine men of the original number, who had not re-enlisted, were mustered out of service, together with four officers. By an order from the War Department, on the 5th of November, this organization was transferred to the First Regiment of New Hampshire Heavy Artillery, with the designation of Battery M, but guarantied to remain detached as a Light Battery in the field. Perhaps no organization from this State rendered more faithful and valuable service to the country, or made for itself a more honorable record, than the First New Hampshire Battery, in the three years of its existence.

FIRST HEAVY ARTILLERY.

In April, 1863, the War Department granted special authority to raise in New Hampshire a company of Heavy Artillery, to garrison the defenses of Portsmouth harbor, and on the 17th of that month Charles H. Long, late Lieut. Colonel of the Seventeenth Regiment—which was not mustered into the United States service—was commissioned Captain. The organization was completed and the company was mustered into the service on the 22d of July, 1863, and stationed at Fort Constitution.

On the 18th of August, 1863, Ira McL. Barton, formerly a Captain in the Fifth Regiment, was commissioned Captain of a second company, raised under similar authority and for similar purposes as the first. It was mustered into the United States service on the 17th of September, and was stationed at Fort McClary, Kittery Point.

These companies remained at their respective posts until May, 1864. During this time the first company made many improvements in Fort Constitution, building a long set of quarters for the men. The second company, stationed at Fort McClary, upon the Quartermaster's purchasing the lumber, built, without any assistance, one of the finest hospitals belonging to the United States on the New England coast. On the 6th of May, both companies, under orders from Major General Dix reported to General Augur, commanding the Department of Washington, and were assigned for duty in the defenses of that city. Company A furnished men for garrison duty at Forts Slocum, Stevens, Totten, Sumner, and Batteries Parrott, Cameron, Kendall, and Vermont. Company B was sent as a relieving and occupying force into ten different forts, among them Forts Bunker Hill, Saratoga, Lincoln, Bayard, Gaines, and Foote, at which last important work they were stationed as a permanent garrison. Company A was stationed in the defenses north of the city, and assisted in defeating Early in his raid on Washington—Captain Long being in command of a Provisional Battalion of four hundred men.

In August, 1864, Captain Ira McL. Barton made application to the Secretary of War, through Governor Joseph A. Gilmore, of New Hampshire, for leave to raise a battalion of at least four companies of Heavy Artillery, which was granted on the 19th of August. Captain Barton was placed on recruiting service by the War Department, and returning to New Hampshire, took charge of the organization of the companies, under Adjutant General Natt Head. In the meantime a third company had been started, and was quickly raised by Captain J. O. Chandler, of Manchester. The four additional companies authorized by the War Department were very soon filled. One at Dover, by Captain George W. Colbath; one at Concord, by Captain R. S. Davis; one at Nashua, by Captain D. J. Flanders, and one at Laconia, by Captain A. S. Libby. Recruits came in so rapidly that the four companies authorized were soon more than filled, and Adjutant General Head obtained authority to raise other companies. One was raised at Newport by Captain C. C. Shattuck, and another at Lancaster, by Captain Charles O. Bradley, while a third was organized from a ninety days' company at Fort Constitution, and a fourth from general volunteers at Concord, the former under Captain George C. Houghton, and the latter under Captain R. E. Welch.

The companies were ordered to Washington as fast as they were organized, and were assigned to duty under the direction of Major General Augur. Ten companies having been organized, and the eleventh having been commenced, authority was given to complete the regimental organization. The Governor commissioned Captain Long as Colonel, and Captain Barton as Lieut. Colonel. Lieut. Colonel Barton was immediately mustered, and was relieved from duty in New Hampshire by Colonel Long, who undertook the completion of the regiment. It being found impossible to raise the twelfth company, which was necessary to fully complete the regimental organization, and to admit of the muster of Colonel Long, the New Hampshire Light Battery was assigned to the regiment, and on the 16th of November Colonel Long was mustered and assumed command. The following is a list of the field, staff and company officers, and the official record of each:

SHARPSHOOTER.

SHARPSHOOTERS.

New Hampshire furnished three companies of Sharpshooters for the army. In the summer of 1861, Colonel Berdan procured permission from the War Department to raise a force of Sharpshooters, and a promise that two thousand Sharpe's rifles should be manufactured for them. The result was the First and Second Regiments of United States Sharpshooters, commonly known as Berdan's Sharpshooters, of which the three companies from this State formed a part. Colonel Berdan asked the Governor first for one, and then for two more companies. The test prescribed by the War Department for Sharpshooters was: each man must make a string of ten shots, measuring, in the aggregate, from center of bull's eye to center of ball, not more than fifty inches, at a distance of one hundred yards off-hand, or two hundred yards at a rest. This was the maximum, but the strings of the men admitted into the first company varied from seven to thirty inches. It was mustered into the United States service on the 9th of September, 1861, and left the State for Weehawken, New Jersey, the rendezvous of the first regiment, on the 11th, and was assigned to the first regiment as Company E. The second company was mustered into service on the 28th of November, 1861, and the third on the 10th of December, 1861. Each of these companies consisted of three officers and ninety-five men. They left the State for Washington as soon as mustered, and reported to Colonel Berdan, at Camp of Instruction. They were assigned to the second regiment as Companies F and G. The following were the officers of all these companies during their term of service, with the record of each:

Company E spent the winter of 1861-62 at Camp of Instruction in drilling and target practice. Early in the spring of 1862 the First Regiment United States Sharpshooters was assigned to Fitz John Porter's Division, with which it made its first campaign. On the 9th of March, in a reconnoissance toward Big Bethel, the only enemy found was a few cavalry scouts, one of whom was shot from his horse at a distance of about thirteen hundred yards, by private James Morse, of company E. This was the first man shot on either side in the Peninsula campaign. The regiment took the advance of the Fifth Corps on the march to Yorktown, and on the 5th of April distinguished themselves in the first battle of the campaign, crawling up near the enemy's works and with their target rifles picking off the rebel gunners so surely as to render their batteries nearly useless. It was in this engagement that the company lost its first man killed, private J. S. M. Ide, of Claremont. During the long siege of Yorktown which succeeded, the sharpshooters were constantly at work, and kept the enemy from molesting working parties.

After the capture of Yorktown, on the 5th of May, they proceeded by water to West Point, where they exchanged their target guns for Sharpe's rifles. On the 27th they took part in the battle of Hanover Court House, and then accompanied Porter's Corps through the famous seven days' fight, losing heavily in the battles of Mechanicsville, Gaines' Mill and Malvern Hill. At the latter place Second Lieut. C. E. Jones was wounded and taken prisoner, soon after which he died. At Gainesville and second Bull Run, in August, the company suffered considerable loss in killed and wounded, among the latter of whom was Captain William P. Austin, of Claremont, who had his arm severely shattered. At Blackford's Ford, on the 19th of September, in a sharp engagement, they drove the rebels and captured several pieces of artillery. They took part in the terrible battle of Fredericksburg, on the 13th of December, and were the last troops withdrawn across the river after the attack was abandoned.

Early in January, 1863, the two regiments of sharpshooters were brought together in one command, under Colonel Berdan. While thus organized they took part in the great battle of Chancellorsville, where they greatly distinguished themselves, first in the engagement known as "The Cedars," where they took the entire Twenty-third Georgia Regiment prisoners, and afterward in the great battle of May 3d, where they suffered heavily.

At the battle of Gettysburg the sharpshooters were almost constantly engaged, and contributed their full share toward that victory which saved Washington from capture, and turned the tide in favor of the Union arms. They then joined in the pursuit of Lee, and bore the brunt of the sharp fight of Wapping Heights, where their splendid skill in skirmishing, their coolness and the deliberation and accuracy of their aim won great praise from Generals Meade and French, who were eyewitnesses of their movements. They also distinguished themselves in a charge at Auburn, on the 13th of October, which elicited a special complimentary order from the Corps commander. At Kelley's Ford, November 3d, they drove the enemy across the Rappahannock, captured a large number of prisoners, and gained a lodgment of the Union forces on the other side of the river. Here Sergeant Samuel D. Monroe, who had been commissioned first lieutenant, but not mustered, was instantly killed. On the 27th and 28th of November, in the severe battles at Locust Grove and Mine Run, they took an active part, and suffered considerable loss.

In the winter the sharpshooters were assigned to the Third Brigade, Third Division, Second Army Corps, General Hancock commanding, with Brigadier General Alexander Hayes as brigade commander. With this brigade they went through the bloody campaign of the summer of 1864, under fire almost without cessation, every day from the 5th of May until they were mustered out of service, during which campaign Captain W. G. Andrews and First Lieut. Isaac Davis were both wounded.

On the 8th of September the original members of Company E, less than a score in number, were mustered out of service. By order of the various Corps commanders under which it served, this company was allowed to inscribe upon its colors the names and dates of thirty battles and skirmishes in which it participated, the first being at Lewinsville, September 27, 1861, and the last at Deep Bottom, August 15 and 16, 1864.

Companies F and G formed a part of the Second Regiment. After remaining at Camp of Instruction, near Washington, through the winter of 1861-62, on the 18th of March the regiment was assigned to the brigade of General Augur, First Division, First Corps, and joined the command at Camp Williams, near Fairfax Seminary. They met the enemy for the first time at Falmouth, on the 15th of April, and in a short skirmish drove them across the Rappahannock. At the time of Banks' retreat to Harper's Ferry, and during the trip, the regiment lost one man killed and about sixty wounded, by a collision of trains on the railroad. On the 12th of July Captain H. M. Caldwell, Company F, died of typhoid fever, and the service thus lost a brave, patriotic and faithful officer. First Lieut. J. H. Hildreth was detailed as aid to General Gibbon, and the command of the company devolved on Lieut. Rowell.

At Rappahannock Station, in a sharp engagement, on the 23d of August, Company F had its first man wounded—Sergeant J. P. Dodge, of New Boston. The two companies bore an honorable part in the disastrous campaign of General Pope, in the battles of Sulphur Springs, Gainesville, and Bull Run. They won great praise from their commanding officers at the battles of South Mountain and Antietam, where they suffered heavy losses. Among the killed was Second Lieut. J. W. Thompson, of Company G, who was shot through the head while attempting to capture a stand of rebel colors. The regiment was hotly engaged at Fredericksburg, on the 13th of December, under General Franklin. As stated, the two regiments of sharpshooters were brought together in one brigade, early in January, 1863, and so continued through the campaign of the succeeding summer. At Sulphur Springs the First Regiment was transferred to the third brigade, while the Second remained with General Ward's, taking part in the battles of Kelly's Ford, Locust Grove, Mine Run, and encamped during the winter at Brandy Station. In January, 1864, more than two-thirds of each company re-enlisted, and the regiment became a veteran regiment and received a furlough.

The history of these companies during the bloody campaign of 1864, is mainly like that of company E. They were used mostly as skirmishers and sharpshooters, and were almost constantly under fire. From the time of the consolidation of the two regiments, in January, 1863, they participated in the same battles and skirmishes as Company E. Previous to this time they participated in eight engagements, in all of which they acted with great coolness and gallantry. Major Rowell was wounded severely at the battle of Petersburg; Captain Murray, Company F, was taken prisoner at the battle of Ream's Station, and was in the hands of the enemy several months, and Captain H. P. Smith, Company G, was severely wounded in the battle of the Wilderness. The few original men of these two companies who had not re-enlisted, were mustered out of service at the expiration of their term, in November and December, 1864. The remainder, with the rest of the regiment, were consolidated into one company, with those left of the First Regiment, and were transferred to the Fifth New Hampshire, in which they formed Company K, with three officers, Captain Griggs, First Lieut. Follansbee, and Second Lieut. Fletcher.

These three companies of Sharpshooters contained some of the best rifle shots in the State, and have not been surpassed by any organization from New Hampshire for the intelligence and soldierly qualities of their members. They participated in more battles and skirmishes than the average of regiments, and probably killed more rebels than the same number of troops in any other arm of the service; while from their having been seldom used in line of battle in dense masses, they suffered less loss in comparison than many other regiments.

From the above it will be seen that the whole number of commissioned officers in the war from New Hampshire was 1601; enlisted men, recruits and substitutes, 31,149—making a total of men from the State of 32,750, out of a population of less than 330,000, or about ten per cent. of the whole population.

The Fifth Regiment lost the greatest number of men killed, though the Twelfth suffered most heavily in proportion to its numbers, losing over one-tenth of its members on the field, while the loss of the Fifth was less than one-twelfth. The First, Sixteenth and Seventeenth regiments lost no men killed in battle. The Ninth lost the greatest absolute number, but the Sixteenth the greatest percentage by disease. The deaths in the latter amounted to over twenty per cent., notwithstanding it was never in an engagement. The number of desertions varied with the number and character of the recruits received in the latter months of the war. Many deserted on their way to the field, and never reached the regiment to which they were assigned.

The authorities of the State looked well to the needs of her soldiers, under all circumstances. Colonel Frank E. Howe, of the City of New York, and Robert R. Carson, of Philadelphia, were early appointed agents to look after, provide and care for the sick and wounded soldiers of New Hampshire who were in hospitals or passing through those cities, and each forwarded monthly reports of names, disability and deaths in the several hospitals, and other important facts in relation to soldiers coming under their observation. Other agents were appointed and sent to army hospitals and battle fields to look after the sick and wounded and bury the dead.

From the 1st to the 15th of April, 1865, great events transpired, agitating the country from one end to the other. Richmond was taken, Lee's army surrendered to General Grant, at Appomattox Court House—and while the north was rejoicing at the prospect of a speedy peace and a happy issue out of our national difficulties, President Lincoln was assassinated at Ford's Theater, in Washington, where he went by special invitation, on the evening of the 14th, by John Wilkes Booth, and expired the next morning, about half-past seven o'clock. The country was plunged into deep mourning. The same day Andrew Johnson, the Vice President, was inaugurated President of the United States. In accordance with recommendation from Washington, the Governor of New Hampshire issued a proclamation suggesting that funeral obsequies be observed throughout the State on the 19th, which was obeyed by every considerable town. President Johnson designated the 1st of June for further memorial service to the lamented Abraham Lincoln, throughout the country, and Governor Gilmore made proclamation to the people of New Hampshire accordingly. Hon. James W. Patterson, then Representative in Congress, accepted an invitation from the Governor and the Honorable Council to pronounce a Funeral Eulogy, at Concord, and the people of the State were invited to assemble there and join in the ceremonies. They turned out in large numbers, including military and other organizations; the exercises agreed upon were fully, solemnly and creditably carried out, and the procession was the largest ever known in the State. It was a spontaneous expression of the sorrow of the people for the loss of a great, good and patriotic man, respected and beloved by every true American, as no other man had been since George Washington.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

GOVERNOR ICHABOD GOODWIN.

Ichabod Goodwin was born in that part of the ancient town of Brunswick, Maine, now known as North Berwick, in October, 1796. When fourteen years old he entered, as clerk, the counting room of Samuel Lord, Esq., a merchant, of Portsmouth. In 1817 he went to sea as supercargo to a ship, in the employment of John P. & Samuel Lord, of Portsmouth. Soon after he sailed as master and supercargo of one of their ships, and then became interested with them in the ships he commanded. In 1832 he abandoned the sea, and engaged in an extensive mercantile business, in connection with Samuel E. Coues, Esq., at Portsmouth. He represented that city in the popular branch of the New Hampshire Legislature, in 1838, '43, '44, '50, '54, and '56, and was a member of the Constitutional Convention in 1850. He was the first President of the Eastern Railroad Company, in New Hampshire, and held the office for twenty years. In 1847 he was elected the President of the Portland, Saco, and Portsmouth Railroad Company, which office he still holds. In March, 1859, Mr. Goodwin was elected Governor of New Hampshire, and was re-elected in 1860—his term of office extending to June 5, 1861, covering the breaking out of the rebellion and the raising of the first two regiments of volunteer infantry from the State in the War of the Rebellion. This was a most trying period in the history of New Hampshire, and most nobly and patriotically did Governor Goodwin meet the emergency. The people had confidence in his wisdom and financial skill, and when he issued a call for men and money for the war they responded promptly. There were no funds in the treasury aside from what was required to meet the ordinary expenses of the State, and the crisis demanded "the sinews of war" in such amount as then seemed very large, and that the quota of men called for by the President from New Hampshire should be raised and made ready for the field without delay. He appealed to the banking institutions and private individuals of the State—those of other States had their own burdens to bear—and they promptly and nobly came forward and placed at his disposal six hundred and eighty thousand dollars. To call an extra session of the Legislature would involve delay and a considerable expense, and Governor Goodwin, with the advice of his Council, assumed the responsibility, as Commander-in-Chief of the Militia, to act without special legislative authority. On the assembling of the Legislature, in June, in a valedictory address, he plainly and concisely stated the position he assumed and the motives which actuated him. The Legislature at once endorsed all his acts by unanimously passing "the Enabling Act," relieving the Governor of his heavy responsibility. His administration of State affairs for two years met with almost universal approval, and he left the office with the highest respect of all parties.

As a member of the Legislature and of the Constitutional Convention he took a leading part on committees and in debate. His speeches were never made for show. He spoke only when there seemed to be occasion for it, and then always to the point, and was listened to with great respect and attention, for his conservatism and practical wisdom in all matters of public policy were well known. In all public positions he discharged his duties with fidelity, industry and marked ability. As a citizen and business man he is public spirited, liberal, high-minded, and enjoys the unbounded confidence and respect of all.

GOVERNOR NATHANIEL S. BERRY.

Nathaniel S. Berry, the thirty-sixth Governor of New Hampshire, was born at Bath, Me., on the 1st of September, 1796. His father, who was a ship carpenter, died in 1802, leaving his mother with four young children. When Nathaniel was ten years old his mother married again, and when twelve he came with his mother and step-father to Lisbon, New Hampshire. He subsequently served an apprenticeship at the tanning and currying business in Bath, this State. He commenced the tanning and currying business on his own account at Bristol, New Hampshire, and resided there twenty-two years. In 1828 he represented that town in the New Hampshire Legislature, and also in 1833 and 1834. He was elected to the State Senate from the Eleventh District in 1835 and 1836, and was returned to the House of Representatives from Bristol in 1837. In 1840 he moved to Hebron, where he built an extensive tannery and entered into business. In 1841 he was appointed Judge of the Court of Common Pleas for Grafton County, which office he held until 1850, when he resigned. In 1854 he was elected to the Legislature from Hebron, and in 1856 was appointed Judge of Probate for the County of Grafton, which office he resigned the day before his inauguration as Governor of New Hampshire, in June, 1861. He was a delegate from this State to the Democratic National Convention, in 1840, and was several times candidate for Governor on the Liberty and Free Soil tickets.

In January, 1849, Judge Berry's tannery at Hebron, was destroyed by fire. He immediately rebuilt it, and it was again destroyed by that devouring element in 1857. Each time his loss was quite heavy over and above his insurance. After the last fire he looked over his affairs, and found that he could pay all his liabilities and have a small amount left. Being then above sixty years old, he concluded not to rebuild, and retired from the business that he had followed from his early youth.

Judge Berry was first elected Governor in March, 1861, just about a month before the first rebel gun was fired at Fort Sumter, and was inaugurated the following June, after the First Regiment had been sent to the field, and while the Second was being organized. It was a position of greater responsibility than any New Hampshire Governor had ever been placed in before, but conscious of the rectitude of his intentions he assumed it with a determination to answer, as far as he was able, every demand of the general government for troops to aid in putting down the rebellion, with promptness and fidelity. No man was ever influenced by purer or more patriotic motives in all he did, from first to last, than was Governor Berry. During the two years of his administration, from June, 1861, to June, 1863, nearly all of the New Hampshire Regiments and other organizations were raised and put into the field; and it is not saying more than the truth when it is asserted that no troops went forth from any state better armed, equipped and supplied with the necessaries of the camp than those from New Hampshire. When in the field they were watched over and cared for by the Governor as if they had been his own children, and many a young man who went forth in answer to the call of his country, will remember the words of encouragement and cheer spoken to him by our good, Christian Chief Magistrate, and his frequent visits to their camps in the field. His faithfulness and patriotism was rewarded with a re-election, in 1862, by a flattering majority.

All of Governor Berry's acts while in office were characterized with care and prudence, and his State papers brief, concise and clear in language and wise and prudent in their suggestions. When at the end of his second term, in June, 1863, he retired from office, he carried with him the unqualified respect of all with whom he had been brought in contact, and the good wishes of the people of the entire State. Soon after this Governor Berry removed to Andover, Mass., where he still resides, leading a quiet, peaceful and happy life, honored and respected for his many admirable qualities of head and heart.

GOVERNOR JOSEPH A. GILMORE.

Governor Gilmore was born at Weston, Windsor County, Vermont, in 1811. He had the advantage of a good common school and academic education, such as most boys at that time enjoyed. His father died when Joseph was but a lad, leaving him dependent upon his own efforts for a livelihood. He went to Boston while quite young, was clerk in a mercantile establishment, and afterward was in business on his own account. About thirty years ago he removed to Concord, New Hampshire, where he was for some time engaged in a heavy mercantile business. He was subsequently chosen Superintendent of the Concord Railroad, and was interested as owner and manager in other railroads running into Concord. He was a man of wonderful activity and energy, pushing to completion any work left to his care. In 1858 and 1859 he represented his district in the New Hampshire Senate, and the latter year was president of that body. He was elected Governor of New Hampshire in March, 1863, and was re-elected the following year. His first and all succeeding messages to the Legislature were full of patriotic expressions and suggestions; and in the two years during which he was Governor, he promptly furnished all troops demanded by the War Department in its several calls upon the State, and was untiring in his attention to the necessities of New Hampshire men in the field and military hospitals. He sent medical men and others, as the exigencies of the war seemed to require them, to attend the wounded during the active operations of the army, and the sick at all times. During these two years no New England State had a more active Chief Magistrate, or one who had its honor and the comfort of its soldiers more nearly at heart than Governor Gilmore. He died on the 17th of April, 1867.

GOVERNOR FREDERICK SMYTH.

Frederick Smyth, the thirty-eighth Governor of New Hampshire, was born in Candia, Rockingham County, March 9, 1819. His father was a farmer of thrifty habit, in good circumstances, and his mother was a daughter of Isaiah Rowe, a soldier of the Revolution. His youth was spent in assisting his father upon the farm and attending the public school in the district.

After availing himself of the schools at home, to the full extent of their advantages, he studied a brief term at Andover, Mass., under charge of Dr. Coleman. The money requisite for this purpose was earned by school teaching and working between schools—his first experience in this way being at Auburn, when he was seventeen years of age.

He had a strong desire to enter college, but the way did not seem clear, and eager to be doing, he entered into trade at the old place known for many years in Candia as the "Master Fitts store," in partnership with Thomas Wheat—being of about equal age. After a short time they abandoned the business, and both, in 1838, removed to Manchester, where Dr. Wheat is now a physician in extensive practice, and a highly respected citizen. Frederick, then nineteen years of age, obtained a clerkship in a large dry goods and grocery store, doing his work with characteristic zeal. He soon found sufficient encouragement, and began business for himself, in that then new and rapidly growing place.

In 1844 he married Emily, daughter of John Lane, Esq., of Candia, a near neighbor to the old homestead. In 1849 he was chosen City Clerk, which office he held for three years, and until his election as Mayor, in 1852. He was chosen to the mayoralty three years in succession, and each time by increased majorities. Some of the best permanent improvements of the city are due to his energetic administration. Among these may be named the trees now affording such grateful shade; ornamentation of the parks; the annexation of Piscataquog and Amoskeag, and the building a new and more commodious depot, after a prolonged contest with the Concord Railroad corporation.

The establishment of a free city Library met with considerable opposition from various quarters; but the Mayor's efforts and influence secured the success of the enterprise. From a small beginning it has by annual appropriations by the city, and in other ways, grown to be one of the most extensive and valuable collections of books in the State, and a blessing to all the people of Manchester. The late Chief Justice Bell, one of the warmest and most constant friends of the library, evinced his estimate of this act by a resolution offered in the Board of Trustees, March 17, 1855, thanking Mayor Smyth for "his early, decided and successful exertions as chief magistrate of the city," in this behalf. In 1864—a time of peculiar financial difficulty—his fellow citizens, without distinction of party, prevailed upon him to accept the mayoralty for the fourth time, being elected without any opposition.

In 1855 he was appointed by the Governor and Council, chairman of a Board of Commissioners to locate and build a House of Reformation for Juvenile Offenders. The Manchester Daily Mirror of April 11th, 1862, says:

“How successfully he accomplished this difficult task against bitter opposition and prejudice arising from location and politics combined, which would have disheartened almost any other man, the present popularity of the institution, of which he is now treasurer, bears witness, and will to future generations.”

In 1857-58, he was a member of the popular branch of the State Legislature, and the latter year received a very strong vote in the nominating caucus of his party for Speaker. He was Treasurer and one of the Managers of the State Agricultural Society for ten years or more, and is now a Vice President of the New England Agricultural, and the United States Pomological Societies, and one of the Board of Directors of the United States Agricultural Society.

In 1861 he was appointed by the United States as an agent to the International Exhibition at London, and also held a commission from the United States Agricultural Society to visit such agricultural exhibitions as might be held during the time in Great Britain, or on the Continent. On his arrival in London he was appointed by her Majesty's Commissioners of the International Exhibition, a juror, and was chosen by his associates the reporter for the jury. This position admitted him to the most select circles in London, and also afforded him unusual facilities for acquaintance and association with literary and scientific gentlemen in Europe.

In common with others, Mr. Smyth at that time thought that the war would be of short duration, and expected to find matters amicably adjusted on his return. After discharging his duties with fidelity at London, he visited the Continent in company with Charles L. Flint, Esq., Secretary of the Massachusetts Board of Agriculture. When they arrived at Rome in July, 1862, the tidings from home, discouraging enough in fact, became doubly so when received through the distorted medium of continental imagination.

Mr. Smyth deeming it his duty to be at home, shortened his intended trip. At Frankfort the news improved in character; but they decided to keep on, and arrived at New York in September. Through the following winter, while giving needed attention to the affairs of the First National Bank, of which he is principal financial manager, and of the Savings Bank, of which he is Treasurer, he threw his influence in favor of taking largely of government bonds, at a time when the country was in distress for means to carry on the war, and when it was regarded as a doubtful investment.

In May, 1863, a fair in aid of the Sanitary Commission was projected in Manchester. Mr. Smyth was chairman of the committee having it in hand, gave the use of his hall, and several weeks of earnest labor in urging it forward. It was remarkably successful—netting about four thousand dollars for the relief of sick and wounded soldiers. It may be here stated, that although he had passed the legal age for military service, he furnished at his private expense a good, able-bodied man, who served during the war.

On the memorable first four days of July in that year, the battle of Gettysburg was fought. The late Governor Gilmore immediately sent to the field some of the most prominent citizens, physicians and others, to aid in care of the wounded. Mr. Smyth, with the late George Hutchins of Concord—a most worthy and patriotic gentleman, who, with his wife, was among the lost on board the steamer United States, on the Ohio river, on the 4th of December, 1868—pushed through from Baltimore by cattle cars, teams and on foot, and was one of the first to reach the field. A surgeon who was present, in a letter wrote: "The prompt, efficient and able manner in which he aided both officers and men with counsel, and means to procure needed articles for the relief of distress, was remarked by all. Through drenching rain, through mud, wading swollen creeks, he seemed everywhere present." In this case, however, his zeal was too great for his strength. The sickening effluvia of the battle field, the sounds and sights of distress, beyond all human aid, added to neglect of proper food, brought him to a sick bed, where he was confined during most of the fall of 1863. The next May, while Grant's army was making its way to Richmond, Mr. Smyth again visited the battle field after the sanguinary contest of the Wilderness. Under the broiling sun of a Virginia May, with arms bare to the work, he helped carry the wounded from the field to Fredericksburg, where such care was given them as could be had. Many a New Hampshire boy owes his life to these exertions.

Meantime the numerous friends of Mr. Smyth throughout the State, and others who had been looking anxiously for some leader fitted to meet a somewhat critical financial emergency, brought forward his name prominently as a candidate for Governor. It was received with favor in all quarters; the nomination was harmoniously made in convention, favorably received by the people, while his political opponents even conceded the admirable personal qualities of the nominee. In its issue of January 6, 1865, the Boston Journal said:

"In the selection of Mr. Smyth as candidate for Governor, the Union men have done themselves much credit and the State a great service. Mr. Smyth is widely and favorably known for his interest in agriculture and mechanic arts, for his enterprise and public spirit, and for his administrative ability. With the constant drain upon the resources of the State in response to the calls of patriotism, and with finances already slightly embarrassed by advances made to volunteers, it will require unusual financial ability in the executive to maintain the credit of the State. Mr. Smyth, we believe, possesses all the requisite qualifications, and with his business habits, sound judgment and untiring energy, and the steady determination of the people to maintain their credit, the Granite State will come out triumphantly from its embarrassments."

These auguries proved true. Governor Smyth was inaugurated in June 1865, having been elected by a majority of 6084. Said the Independent Democrat, published at Concord :

“It is the largest majority received by any candidate for that position in this State, for twenty-four years. It is but a just tribute to unblemished public and private character, to excellent mental ability, well improved and well directed, and to peculiar fitness in head, heart and hand for the responsible position to which he has been assigned.”

The main purpose of his inaugural message was to awaken confidence in the credit and resources of the State. Giving the full amount of the debt, he set off against it as no previous State paper had ever done or perhaps had ever occasion to do, the agricultural, mechanical and commercial resources of New Hampshire. Some of the towns, restive under unwonted debt, wished to have the State assume their liabilities. Although no formal demand was made, the Governor yet thought best to reply to a popular desire, as follows :

“The war debt of the loyal States was incurred equally with that of the nation, for national purposes, and they have cheerfully assumed and voluntarily borne its burdens, under many disadvantages. The general government, to preserve its own life, has been obliged to take virtual possession of the money market by exempting its securities from state and municipal taxation, and by increasing the ordinary rates of interest. This has borne heavily upon the visible property and depressed the securities of the states. Whatever means shall be devised by which a share, at least, of this burden shall be discharged by those parties to the rebellion to whom it rightfully belongs, will meet with the cordial approval of the people. When Congress manifests a disposition to move in this matter, the claims of our cities and towns should be considered and adjusted. Any state action prior to this can afford no relief. Should the State now assume the town debts, it must levy a tax directly upon the towns, as its own present debt is already quite as large as we shall be able to fund, or manage so as to preserve the public credit.”

After giving the number of soldiers sent to the field, the Governor said :

“Our State will never be unmindful of the heroic deeds of her sons in the great struggle for national life. They sprang to arms at the first call, and no considerable battle has been fought in which they have not participated. During the early days of the rebellion, they were at times cast down by temporary defeat, but in every instance only to rally with renewed vigor. * * * It will not be easy for us to pay our debt of gratitude to these brave men. * * * I desire to call your attention to the case of soldiers permanently disabled in the service of their country. The scanty provisions of the general government will in many cases prove entirely inadequate for their support or that of their families, and the assistance of the towns and cities in which they reside will necessarily be invoked. I recommend that in all cases where soldiers or their families are assisted in this manner, that the laws be so amended, that none of the disabilities that attach to paupers shall apply to them. I wish also earnestly to recommend that all persons in places of influence, all who have honorable employment to offer, should discriminate, if possible, in favor of the returned soldier. Encourage those who are disabled in any industry of which they may be capable. Let the soldier see, that while we revere the name and fame of the dead, we do not forget the best and highest welfare of the living. So shall we and those who come after us be worthy of the blessings which have been bestowed by the Power that guided our counsels, and led our armies in this great war.

In regard to the battle flags, he suggested, "That these proud but sad memorials of our recent terrible conflict be conspicuously displayed in the halls of your deliberations, that by them we may be constantly reminded, not only of the fortitude and devotion of those who bore them upon the march, and in the hour of battle, but also of our own obligation to sacredly preserve the fruits of these sacrifices."

On national affairs the message was brief, but not uncertain, and took grounds which Congress has at last come to occupy.

"Our armies have not only carried with them a restored authority, but they have opened the way for a higher and nobler civilization, without which there can be no free government, and with which rebellion is impossible. For myself, I shall feel that the great purpose of this war is not attained, the great lesson of this punishment not learned, until free schools, free churches and a free ballot, are established wherever the federal authority extends. This we owe to the good order and permanent security of all the States. This alone will be a commensurate reward for the unparalleled heroism of the brave soldiers who have borne us through the contest. On such a consummation only can we expect the continued favor of heaven and the blessing of the God of our fathers. Let the awful scenes through which we have passed teach us our duty. The blood of the sons of New Hampshire mingled with that of others from every loyal State calls to us from a hundred battle fields, to stand true to the great cause, through all the victory and amidst the signs of accomplished peace.

“The spirit of the last great martyr for universal emancipation, lifted above the cares and weaknesses of this life, bids us be true to the cause. In our sorrow even we take courage, and make the brutal assassination of our noble President—that most wicked fruit of a barbarous system, confirm us in the resolution to make universal freedom a synonym for universal suffrage, under such safeguards as wise legislation may provide.

“All must agree that the States which have been in rebellion should not hereafter be controlled by rebels and traitors; and as we do not propose to admit again into this Union the cause of all this evil, so let us extend to the loyal citizen, of whatever color, those rights justly earned by patience, devotion and unwavering faithfulness to the common cause.

“The weakness and ignorance of the race whose broken shackles paved our way to victory are potent reasons why its condition should no longer be left uncertain or insecure. The question of suffrage is one of those defenses behind which the spirit of slavery will yet intrench itself, and by which it will seek to regain some fragment of its power. If we would have an enduring and prosperous peace, we shall level every obstruction, concede nothing to the prejudices of slavery and give the freedman the right to assert that manhood peacefully at the ballot box which he has so nobly proved on the battle field. Let no fear of apparent difficulties in the way deter us; there is no danger so great to a nation as the existence of a flagrant injustice in its midst, sanctioned and fostered by its authority. Let us therefore be just and hope for continued favor from the source of all prosperity.”

Contemporary criticism on the message was very favorable. “His views,” said the Independent Democrat, “upon national topics, are expressed with a clearness, precision and positiveness which even partisan opposition can but approve.”

“It is not often,” remarked the Keene Sentinel, “that we have a better message from a New Hampshire Governor, whether we regard it in its sentiments, or in the manner of expressing them.”

“One of our best papers of the kind,” observed the careful Statesman, “that has appeared in New Hampshire. The public concerns of the State are set forth with clearness, the brief portion appropriated to national concerns is fully imbued with the spirit of patriotism.”

That these commendations were not mere empty words, will appear from the fact that every one of its practical suggestions was adopted and acted upon by the Legislature. In less than three months he raised for State purposes $1,200,000, one-third of which was obtained in Manchester. The loans were effected in such manner that they improved, rather than depreciated, the credit of the State.

When Lee's army had surrendered, the New Hampshire men who went to and fought through the four years' war, were anxious to return to their homes, and by Governor Smyth's influence with the War Department, most of the regiments from this State were among the first ones mustered out of the service. All through June and July the returning regiments from the war thronged the streets of the State capital, and were received with cordial greeting from Governor Smyth. He saw that they were promptly paid, listened to their grievances, praised their heroic deeds, and was never weary of work in their behalf.

The Second was the first three years' regiment which went to the war from New Hampshire, and the last to return. At its reception at Concord, in December, 1865, Governor Smyth, being introduced by Adjutant General Natt Head, said he was proud to welcome to the State the Second Regiment. There were those who could not be welcomed home, having yielded up their lives on the bloody fields of war. He was reminded of the scenes of Gettysburg, where it was his fortune to assist in caring for the wounded, and performing the last sad duties to the dead. He remembered passing a building which he was told contained none but rebels, and on hearing his name called, he entered there to find members of this regiment, whom he removed to the spot where the wounded of the regiment were lying, and he was happy to see one of those men before him to-day. There was one person he did not see, who ought to be present on this occasion, and that was Miss Harriet P. Dame. She had labored and slept on the battle-field, caring for the wounded and sick, the dying and the dead. They all knew her deeds of kindness. She was a noble woman, to be held in kind remembrance by the people of this State.

Of the dozen or more regiments of all arms dismissed with words of deserved praise, from the Eleventh, under Colonel Harriman, which returned from the surrender of Lee in season to participate in the inauguration ceremonies of June 8th, to the Second, from the northern neck of Virginia, where Colonel Patterson ruled the conquered land, probably no soldier of them all could resist the feeling that the Governor was his true friend.

Sometime in July an order had been issued discontinuing the Webster Hospital, in Manchester. As several sick and wounded soldiers were likely to be greatly injured by this proceeding, the Governor addressed a feeling protest to Surgeon General Barnes, arguing the case on grounds of economy as well as humanity, and closing as follows :

“ In behalf of our sick and suffering heroes who look to me as the executive of the State to watch over and care for them in their misfortunes, to alleviate their sufferings, as far as in human power, and to secure them all the comforts and consolations of which their unhappy circumstances admit, I most earnestly protest against the contemplated change, so long as hospital facilities are required in this State. I beg leave to renew my previous application for the transfer of New Hampshire soldiers in other States to our own.”

On the 20th of July, the Governor being present at the annual dinner of the Dartmouth Alumni Association, in Hanover, made a pertinent speech, which was received with flattering applause. The Faculty at that time, in recognition of his warm interest in the college, conferred upon him the degree of Master of Arts.

On the 5th of September the second annual fair of the New England Agricultural Society took place at Concord, and according to arrangement, it fell to the lot of Governor Smyth to deliver the address. It was very practical, urging farmers to use their best methods, and speaking plainly of their needs. There was evident here, as in all the Governor's addresses, a certain devotion to the State, carefully subordinated to the broader interests of the nation. On this occasion the New England Governors honored Governor Smyth by their presence. The New England Society's published report said, that

“The address was listened to with the most profound interest by an audience of more than ten thousand persons, and at its close nine enthusiastic cheers were given in honor of the Governor. Upon the platform were seated Governor Andrew, of Massachusetts, Governor Coney, of Maine, and Governor Buckingham, of Connecticut, together with a large number of distinguished persons gathered from all parts of New England.”

Governor Andrew said in the course of some remarks, that “the address of Governor Smyth had filled him with admiration for the zeal and earnestness with which he has entered into the discussion of such important principles.” And called for three cheers for the address, and three more for Governor Smyth, and they were given with a will. The same season while attending the County Fair at Milford, he faithfully admonished the farmers that much remained to be done. He said :

“There is scarcely a limit to the progress which lies in our reach, if our active and enterprising young men will remain with us and give their energies to this pursuit. It is one of the highest duties of parents to cultivate in the hearts of their sons attachment for home. The flowers should blossom by the walks and shed their fragrance in the beaten play-ground ; the vine should climb the lattice by the door, and the ample trellis with its delicious fruitage ; the pear and the plum tree should have their place, surrounded by the kindred delicacies which are seldom found even in the gardens of the rich. All these with little care and little expense can be made to beautify every habitation in the State, and not only to beautify but add substantially to their value, and the enjoyment of the occupants. In conclusion let me urge upon you all to unite in earnest efforts to advance the prosperity of our State, and to secure for her that eminence in her varied industrial pursuits which she is capable of attaining.”

Of his agricultural addresses the New Hampshire Statesman said :

“The thanks of his fellow citizens, irrespective of party, are due to Governor Smyth for his encouraging words regarding the future of New Hampshire. He set forth in his addresses at agricultural fairs this autumn, the advantages of our State as one in which permanently to dwell, and in which there is work enough for all to do. He apparently realizes the fact that there are compensating advantages even here; that those who go from New England to more fertile soils, do not find in their new abodes many of the social, religious and even pecuniary advantages enjoyed here."

During the first year of his administration especially, the Governor looked very sharply after the State finances. In a dispatch to the Boston Journal, under date of December 14, 1865, Perley, the regular Washington correspondent of that paper, says:

"Governor Smyth, on his first visit to the Treasury Department, found that instead of an indebtedness on the part of the General Government to New Hampshire of nearly half a million of dollars, as had been reported, the State stood on the books as in debt to the General Government nearly one hundred thousand dollars. The accounts were much confused, and Governor Smyth, applying himself with his usual practical business ability to their disentanglement, yesterday, as the first fruits of his exposition of blunders, received a check for forty-seven thousand one hundred and thirty-four dollars."

While on this mission at Washington, the resident New Hampshire friends of the Governor gave him a serenade and handsome collation and reception, in compliment to his position as Chief Executive of the State, and for his extraordinary services during and after the war. Soon after he was present by invitation at the sixtieth anniversary of the New England Society of New York, and in the course of his remarks at the supper, at Delmonico's, said:

"New Hampshire, sir, is small in extent, but her rocky ribs throb with that vital current which has given life and strength to so many communities on this continent. The sources of the rivers are in the mountains, and there will be found the sources of virtue also. The people, accustomed to a contest with the hard soil, cheered with the health of the pure air, will not soon become enervated. It is not for me to call the roll of her illustrious names or of her victorious soldiers, living or dead. She claims to have done no more than her duty in the great contest for the supremacy of New England ideas, and history may be safely trusted to tell how well. This is an occasion which calls for no exaltation of one state above another. We have learned on the battle field to bury all invidious distinctions, and it is to be hoped that no resurrection of rebellion awaits them. Yet in that generous rivalry which exults in individual success only that it may add to the glory of a common country, we shall not be found wanting. As each separate state of the six whose great day we here commemorate has contributed freely of all that she holds most dear, to enhance the peculiar fame of New England, so, sir, I trust will New England ever prove true to the highest good of the Union. It was the true nobility of labor that threw down the gage in the rebellion, and I rejoice to see it elevated where it belongs of right, even though it had to be raised on a million bayonet points. Labor of the brain and of the hand has made us all we are. United for a praiseworthy common purpose, they are invincible. Let us go from this occasion prepared to assert and defend that Union everywhere and on all occasions, as indispensable to the true glory and prosperity of the union of States which we all hold dear."

What has been here said will give a fair idea of the general character of Governor Smyth's administration and of the influence he had upon the public councils. Active, energetic and hopeful himself, he inspired in others something of the same zeal. While the general government was trying to evoke order out of chaos, confidence out of doubt, and credit from distrust, the Chief Executive officer of New Hampshire labored in every honorable manner to make the State strong enough to bear her share of the responsibility. A single instance will illustrate his method of doing things, and at the same time show how impartial observers regarded it. During the administration of his predecessor it became necessary to put Portsmouth harbor in a state of defense, which was done; but by some means the order of General Wool, required as a voucher to reimburse the State for expenditures, was lost. The State of Rhode Island having a similar case, which did not succeed so well, and there being some feeling upon the subject, the Providence Journal, in speaking of the New Hampshire claim, said:

"Governor Smyth had two courses before him. He might have attacked the man who had rushed with alacrity and ardor to put the Navy Yard in a state of defense. He might have made a message about the matter to the Legislature. He might have ordered some of his tools in the Legislature to recommend a vote of censure on the man. He might have filled New Hampshire with his outcries and distributed political pamphlets at the expense of the State and—done nothing to secure the payment of the claim. Or he could institute a diligent search for the vouchers, which were needed to substantiate the claim, which he knew to be a good one; explain the circumstances in which the service was rendered and press upon the officers at Washington every consideration which would be likely to further his cause. He was wise enough to choose the latter course, or rather the former was so contemptible and crazy that it never occurred for an instant to a sensible, high-minded man like him. The result we know. He obtained from General Wool a copy of the order he issued for protecting the yard, and armed with this obtained at once the payment of his claim. A little common sense is not a bad thing, even for a governor to have.

While thus industrious in behalf of the loyal cause, and tireless in the advocacy of his own political principles, the Governor manifests none of that narrow-mindedness which has been prolific of so much strife and dissension. An extract from a brief speech made at Portsmouth, on the Fourth of July, 1866, which was styled by the Portsmouth Journal a “model oration,” and declared to have the pith and “force of a hundred more wordy discourses,” is in point:

“It has always been my belief, Mr. President, that the common prosperity of the whole country could be attained in its truest manner, by the greatest prosperity of individuals, communities, towns and states. Whatever is for the interest of one rightly considered, should be for the advancement of all. It is for this reason that whenever it has been possible, I have urged upon the people of New Hampshire the steady development of their resources. However jealous we may be for the national honor, and however quickly our soldiers sprang to arms to resist unjust encroachments, we rejoice at the national prosperity and welfare of every southern state. To learn this general view and make the subject personal to every citizen, each man labors most truly for the common good when he improves to the utmost the stewardship under his care. Such labors should excite no inconsiderate rivalry, no local jealousy. Nothing would rejoice me, as a citizen of Manchester, more than to see this beautiful seaport of New Hampshire animated in her honorable age with some of the energy and the enterprise of her youth. I am glad to know that in many respects this is now the case. And so I should rejoice to know that Dover and Concord and Keene and Claremont—that every city and town of the good old Granite State, the noble mother of statesmen and the home of soldiers who never surrender—were making steady and rapid progress in material prosperity, and educated and Christian freedom. But while this is my prayer for the towns of my native State, I have no sympathy with that narrow vision which is confined to the circle of the horizon which immediately surrounds us. The true American hails everywhere in all this broad land the token of progress: and that is the best government which, when the eternal principles of justice are settled, maintains the balance of contending interests with even hand."

Governor Smyth was unanimously re-nominated at the convention of January 3d, 1866, and triumphantly re-elected.

The most important matter requiring attention during the second year of his administration, was the funding of the State debt, which was left in the hands of the Governor and Council. It was a task of no small difficulty, when it is considered that against an untaxed national bond, bearing interest at six per cent., payable in gold, we could only offer State security at the same rate, payable in currency. The message to the Legislature of June, 1866, gave a plain financial statement, which forced even a watchful democratic paper to admit that "he had made some progress in elucidating the muddle which has so long distinguished the finances of our State." At any rate, capitalists seemed inclined to be satisfied with it, for the debt was successfully funded and the credit of the State established on a firm basis. The Governor discussed somewhat at length the establishment of an Agricultural College, and urged with much earnestness that State provision should be made for disabled soldiers. He said:

"That such men—faithful through wounds and sickness to the very door of death—should be now allowed to drag out the days that remain to them in beggary or pauperism, or that they should be made to feel that their sacrifices are counted of no worth, is a flagrant injustice and a disgrace which I am sure New Hampshire can never permit."

Fortunately at this time the action of the general government obviated the need of any State movement. Governor Smyth's appointment by Congress as one of the Board of Managers for the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, for the long term of six years, was a well merited compliment, and "the right man was in the right place." He has spared neither time nor effort in the discharge of his important duty.

In the early part of October, the Governor by invitation, accompanied the Ameskeag Veterans on a trip to Newburyport, where they were received by the Ancient and Honorable Artillery of that place. A pleasing incident which occurred on the way was noticed by the Newburyport Herald, as follows :

"At Amesbury the companies were received by a committee of citizens and marched through the principal streets. At the residence of the poet Whittier they were brought to a halt, the military doing honor to the man, notwithstanding his Quaker ideas of war. Mr. Whittier appeared on the side walk when he was greeted by the music and then by the loud cheers of the soldiers and people. It was refreshing to see honor done to a man because in all his life he has been manly, and not because of position, wealth, or any of the accidents that surround men. Noble men were they, the poet and the Governor of New Hampshire, standing side by side, both sprung from the lowly and working class of society; both rising in different spheres by mental gifts and practical virtues; both honored much for their patriotism, love of country and love of humanity".

There was a very general desire expressed through the press, and by letters from all sections of the State, that Governor Smyth should consent to a nomination for the third term. Not wishing to violate a time-honored custom in New Hampshire, or leave the people in any doubt as to his position, some weeks before the convention for the nomination of a candidate was held, he wrote a letter positively declining a re-nomination, and it was published in most of the newspapers of the State. His last State paper was a brief valedictory on surrendering his official authority into the hands of his successor, in June, 1867. The Boston Journal of that date said :

"Governor Smyth's Administration has been highly successful, not only in a financial point of view, which is demonstrated by statistics, but in all other respects. He has been indefatigable in pressing the claims of his State, taking refusal after refusal only as spurs to his final triumph. Few states indeed pass from the war period to that of peace in a better condition than New Hampshire, under Governor Smyth's administration."

During the two years of his administration Governor Smyth brought to the discharge of the duties of his office great energy, industry and financial skill. During the last year the state debt had been reduced $ 254,313.18. When he retired from office all the claims of the State against the general Government had been satisfactorily adjusted; the State debt had been funded on advantageous terms, the credit of the State stood at least equal to that of any other, and in his valedictory address—which like all his state papers, was a model for its directness and practical common sense suggestions—he congratulated his successor that he would be relieved from any labor or anxiety relating to financial matters. In this same address he said :

“The total expenditures of New Hampshire for war purposes amount to six millions eight hundred and fifty-two thousand six hundred and seventy-eight dollars. Of this amount there has been paid for bounties, two millions three hundred eighty-nine thousand twenty-five dollars; for the reimbursement to towns of aid furnished families of soldiers, one million eight hundred thirty-five thousand nine hundred eighty-five dollars. There has been reimbursed to the State, by the General Government, for war expenses, eight hundred ninety-seven thousand one hundred twenty-two dollars, much of which has been obtained after repeated rejections. But little more may be expected from this source without action of Congress.”

Among the many evidences of the popular favor with which the administration of Governor Smyth was regarded by the people of all parties, we may name the following as deserving especial notice. Notwithstanding his many and frequent journeys to Washington and other places, on business for the State collecting its dues and adjusting its indebtedness, he always paid all his expenses from his private funds, never drawing from the State Treasury, directly or indirectly one dollar therefor. Although a contingent fund was placed at his disposal by the Legislature of each year of his administration, for such purposes, he never touched one cent of it. The Legislature which succeeded the close of his administration, as a recognition of their appreciation of his strict integrity in this regard, unanimously appropriated fifteen hundred dollars to pay him for these expenses, for which he had made no charge. The Resolution was introduced by a political opponent and its passage urged by complimentary speeches in favor of the Governor, from nearly every prominent political opponent in the Legislature, as is shown by the journals.

On the 16th of October, 1867, the Ex-Governor, by invitation, delivered an address at Washington, N. H., on occasion of the dedication of a soldiers' monument. It was widely published and highly spoken of by the press. The following is an extract from it:

“To us as American citizens, these graves of the loyal dead are perpetual incentives to duty. Every green mound on which the falling leaves of autumn softly drop their gold and scarlet wreathes, every monument of stone or bronze or marble that points from earth to Heaven admonishes us of our sacred charge. As much as any one I believe in peace and peaceful measures; as much as any one I desire the lasting and perpetual union of these States. But in such a presence as this and with all the sacrifice of the long years of blood and carnage so resolutely borne by the people, I, for one, can never consent to any renewal of fraternal union that is not founded on the absolute equality in right of every citizen, irrespective of mere accident of birth. Such I believe to be the trust reposed in us, and especially can no man not personally engaged in the struggle persuade himself that he ought to do less than to retain and improve what they have given us by their lives. Let us cherish neither malice nor revenge, but that love which sacrifices principle is never trustworthy, and a union bound by false compromises must fall with every disturbance of conflicting interests or degenerate into a despotism.”

Since retiring from the position of Governor, which he filled to almost universal acceptance—doing many acts, the influence of which will be felt by the people of the State for many years to come—besides his responsible duties as manager of two large monied institutions in Manchester, he has been one of the most active and important members of the Board of Managers of the National Asylums for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers—of which there are three in the country—devoting to the discharge of these duties a considerable share of his entire time—and all without any compensation whatever, except the consciousness of rendering a service to those noble, unfortunate men who risked their lives and sacrificed their health and limbs in the glorious cause of their country in the war of the rebellion.

GENERAL ANTHONY COLBY.

General Anthony Colby was born at New London, Merrimack County, New Hampshire, on the 13th of November, 1792, and has always resided there. He was bred a merchant as well as a farmer. He has been much in public life, and held all the military commissions from Ensign to Major General in the New Hampshire Militia. He was commissioned Ensign of the Second Company of Light Infantry in the Thirtieth Regiment, September 13, 1814, by Governor John Taylor Gilman. He was subsequently Captain of the same company, and Major, Lieut. Colonel and Colonel of the Thirtieth Regiment. He was commissioned Brigadier General in July, 1835, and promoted to Major General in July, 1837. He was for several years the candidate of the Whig party for Governor, previous to 1846, when he was elected, and held the office one year. In July, 1861, on the resignation of Joseph C. Abbott, he was appointed by Governor Berry, Adjutant and Inspector General of the New Hampshire Militia, and resigned in August, 1862. During this time most of the New Hampshire regiments were raised and put into the field. General Colby filled every office to which he has been called with fidelity. He is a genial, public spirited and liberal gentleman, highly respected throughout the State.

GENERAL DANIEL E. COLBY.

General Daniel E. Colby is a son of General Anthony Colby. He was born at New London in 1816, and has always had his home there. He graduated at Dartmouth College, in the class of 1836, and soon after went into trade in his native town. In 1837 he was appointed aid-de-camp on the staff of his father, Major General Colby. He represented his town in the popular branch of the New Hampshire Legislature, in 1857. He was appointed Adjutant General on the resignation of his father, August 21, 1863, and resigned March 25, 1864.

GENERAL NATT HEAD.

Adjutant General Natt Head was born in Hooksett, May 20, 1828. His father, Colonel John Head, who died in 1836, was a farmer, a heavy lumber dealer and an esteemed and valued citizen. The son continued the business of the father, and in connection with a brother, is still extensively engaged in farming, lumbering and the manufacture of bricks. He was early successful in business and soon gained a reputation for enterprise, integrity and honorable dealing. He took several railroad contracts, building the line from Suncook to Hooksett, and also that from Suncook to Pittsfield. Immediately after the burning of the Military Asylum at Augusta, Maine, the managers of the institution, by reason of the sickness of the Deputy Governor, requested General Head to proceed at once to Augusta to arrange for the comfort and protection of the disabled soldiers who had been so suddenly deprived of a home. The mission was faithfully accomplished. Subsequently General Head contracted with the managers and rebuilt the Asylum. In the financial world he has attained a high rank. He is a Director of the First National Bank and a Trustee of the Merrimack River Savings Bank, of Manchester, President of the China Savings Bank, of Suncook, and a Director of the Suncook Valley Railroad. In civil affairs he exhibits marked executive talent. He has filled various town offices, and in 1861 and 1862 represented Hooksett in the Legislature. He was early and prominently identified with Freemasonry and is a member of Washington Lodge, Mount Horeb Royal Arch Chapter, Adoniram Council and Trinity Commandery of Knights Templar, of Manchester. He is also a member of the Supreme Council, having received all the degrees of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, including the Thirty-Third, and all the degrees in the Rite of Memphis to the Ninety-Fourth. He is connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and was one of the original members of the Howard Lodge, of Suncook.

As a practical farmer, General Head has always taken a deep interest in agriculture. He has been a long time Director of the State Agricultural Society, is now its President and a life member. In 1869 he was appointed by the Governor and Council a Trustee of the New Hampshire College of Agriculture and the Mechanic Arts. From his father, who was many years an officer in the State Militia, and from his paternal grandfather, Captain Nathaniel Head, who served meritoriously as an officer through the Revolutionary War, General Head inherited military taste and spirit. For many years he was a prominent military musician and was Fife Major of the "Old Eleventh Regiment" of State Militia in 1847. In later times he was Chief Bugler of the famous Battalion of Governor's Horse Guards. He has been connected with various military organizations and is now a member of the National Lancers, of Boston, and of the Battalion of Amoskeag Veterans, of Manchester, of which corps he is commander.

FUTURE OF THE

In 1863 he was made Chief of the Governor's Staff, and in 1864 was appointed by Governor Gilmore Adjutant, Inspector and Quartermaster General of the State of New Hampshire. He was called to this position at a time when the nation was in one of the most important crises of the great civil war, and when the loyal people of New Hampshire were straining every nerve to raise the men called for under the President's proclamation of the preceding month. On assuming the duties of the office he found the department very incomplete, but little matter having been collected relating to the outfit of the troops and their achievements in the field although New Hampshire had up to that time sent to the war twenty-six thousand soldiers. In fact not a complete set of muster-in rolls of any regiment could be found in the office. In the face of these obstacles and discouragements and with no appropriation to draw from, General Head at once entered upon the duties of his position, employing upon his own responsibility, three clerks, and procuring the necessary outfit of the office, trusting in the Legislature to reimburse him, which it not only promptly and cheerfully did, but made all additional appropriations for the department that were asked for. During the remainder of the war no State in the Union had a more faithful, efficient and popular Adjutant General than New Hampshire. The clerical duties of the office were performed in an admirable manner and the method by which the records of our soldiers were persistently hunted up and placed on file and the order and system exhibited in carrying on and preserving the extensive and valuable correspondence of the department, were worthy of the highest praise. Many letters are now preserved in the office from the highest military and civil officers of New Hampshire, from the Adjutant Generals of various States and from the War and other departments at Washington, all testifying to the excellence of the system inaugurated and to the highly efficient manner in which the affairs of the office were conducted. The Reports of the department during the administration of General Head, not only give the name and history of every officer and soldier who entered the service from New Hampshire but they contain biographical sketches of all the field officers from the State who were killed in battle or who died from disease during the war, together with a brier history of all the regiments, giving their principal movements from their departure to their return home. These reports further include the Military History of New Hampshire from 1623 to 1861, the records of which period were collected with great perseverance and under many discouragements, from various sources in this and other States, and from the rolls in the War Department, at Washington, thus making the Reports as a whole a work of the greatest value to the people of the present day, and at the same time constituting an invaluable contribution to the military history of the Nation while its worth to posterity cannot be estimated.

Governor Smith, in his valedictory address to the Legislature in June, 1867, said :

“ In the difficult adjustment of our military affairs you will agree with me in warm approval of the energy and efficiency of the Adjutant General, whose work has in all cases been well performed. When it has been my grateful duty to extend a welcoming hand, in behalf of the people of the State, to our brave returning soldiers, he has forwarded my purpose with unflagging interest and zeal. You will not forget that around his department all the memories of the contest now cluster. The long roll of honor is there. There are gathered the blood-stained battle flags, and there will always be found those associations which should inspire us with love of country, and an appreciation of the services of those who gave their lives and shed their blood for the blessings which God bestowed when he gave us the victory.”

Many soldiers who fought through the war had a most natural desire to have some certificate or testimonial, from the state or nation, of their honorable service.

General Head conceived the idea of having engraved on steel, of a suitable size to frame, a handsome memorial certificate, with beautiful and appropriate devices, to be presented to every surviving officer and soldier from the State who did honorable service in the war of the rebellion, and to the widow or nearest relative of those who sacrificed their lives in the great struggle for the life of the nation—to be elegantly filled up with the name, rank, regiment and company in which they served, and the nature and length of service. He was heartily seconded by Governor Smyth, the work of engraving and printing was soon most admirably done, and notice given to all interested that the certificates were ready for delivery to such as were entitled to receive them. Thus an act of justice was done to our noble, brave men; and most gratefully do the living soldiers, and the the surviving relatives of the lamented dead, appreciate and treasure them. A single letter, acknowledging the receipt of one of these certificates, will convey an idea of the sentiment of thousands of similar ones sent to General Head:

GENERAL NATT HEAD:

Dear Sir:—I gratefully acknowledge the receipt of the Soldier's Certificate sent by your order. You cannot imagine how sacredly it will be cherished as a token—from the State of New Hampshire—of respect to my dear soldier boy, who sleeps with the thousands in the Arlington Cemetery, Georgetown, that “sleep that knows no waking.” May the Lord reward the excellent Governor Smyth for his kindness to the soldier. I thank you, sir, and through you the State, which has furnished the beautiful memorial. The soldier, or officer, whose life is spared to receive this gift, will read it with pleasure, and look over the pictures, so significant, with interest. But how many will receive it and gaze upon it with eyes dimmed by tears, as it will remind them of dear ones that are left behind. To such the certificate will have a tender interest, and be preserved among the treasures, more precious than gold. The Sixth Regiment of New Hampshire Volunteers, to which my son belonged, lost many of its “boys,” and to many a sorrowful household your gift will be received and appreciated with thankfulness and tender interest.

Gratefully and tenderly yours,

ABBIE G. JAQUITH.”

What makes these testimonials doubly valuable is the fact that none can obtain them until they show their claim by an honorable and undoubted record during the war. Other New England States soon imitated the example set by New Hampshire, and the good State of Massachusetts is now having one engraved, and all copied more or less from General Head's design.

All the New England States were fortunate in having able, efficient, capable and patriotic Adjutant Generals during the War, all of whom compiled and published reports highly credible to their several departments; but it is not going too far to say that none exceeded, if they equaled, the Adjutant General of New Hampshire in all these desirable qualities, or who did their States better service and greater honor. None, certainly, could be more devoted to the men on the way to the field, while there, or on their return home after the cruel war was over. Many a soldier will remember with gratitude his fatherly care of them on their return to the State, and his assistance with good counsel and needed means in saving them from the hands of sharpers, always in waiting to take advantage of the necessities of soldiers to get possession of their valuable papers, for a merely nominal sum. He assisted all who needed assistance, from his own private means, and strange to say, and to the glory of the New Hampshire soldiers should it be recorded, he never lost a dollar by this generosity and confidence.

As a citizen, General Head occupies a high and popular position by reason of his genial and courteous manners and his large public spirit, while his constant and unwearied devotion to the "Boys in Blue" secured for him their highest respect and esteem and won for him the enduring title of "The Soldiers' Friend."

GENERAL JOHN G. FOSTER.

General John G. Foster was born at Whitefield, Coos County, New Hampshire, on the 27th of May, 1823. When ten years old he removed to Nashua, where he attended the public schools. He also attended the Baptist High School at Hancock, New Hampshire, and subsequently fitted for entering into West Point Military Academy, at Crosby's High School, Nashua. At the request of Hon. Charles G. Atherton, then a representative in Congress from New Hampshire, and Franklin Pierce, then United States Senator, in 1842, he was appointed cadet at West Point, and entered in June of that year. He graduated at that institution, ranking number four in the class, in 1846, with Generals McClellan, Reno, Couch, Seymour, Sturgis, Stoneman, Oakes and Gordon, of the Union army, and Jackson and Wilcox, of the rebel army. He was in the Mexican war, and in 1847 was brevetted first lieutenant, "for gallant and meritorious conduct in the battles of Contreras and Cherubusco." At the storming of El Molino del Rey he fell severely wounded. For his gallantry here he was brevetted captain. In 1854 he was appointed Assistant Professor of Engineering at West Point. He was second in command at Fort Sumter when it was first fired upon by the rebels, from Charleston, in April, 1861, and for the heroism he displayed on this occasion he was promoted to Brigadier General of Volunteers.

General Foster accompanied General Burnside's expedition into North Carolina, bore a conspicuous part in the battle at Roanoke Island, the capture of Newbern, and received the unconditional surrender of all the batteries, all the defenses, and all the troops—over two thousand—upon the island, in February, 1862. In July he was left in command of the department of North Carolina, with a force barely sufficient to hold the positions left him by General Burnside, who had been ordered with the main part of his force, to Fortress Monroe. Late in the autumn he was considerably re-enforced by new regiments from Massachusetts, when he resolved to assume the offensive. He led an expedition from Washington through Williamston to Hamilton, on the Roanoke, where he expected to find and destroy some iron-clads in process of construction; but there were none. The result of the expedition was the liberation of several hundred slaves. In April, 1863, the rebel General Hill made an attack on Washington, N. C., and was handsomely defeated by General Foster. In October he succeeded General Burnside in East Tennessee. All through the war General Foster occupied responsible positions, and was regarded as one of the most accomplished, brave and prudent officers in the army.
