THE Wilson Farm in Gilmanton. Seen at a distance in this picture are some of the fields and houses associated with one of the largest farms in New Hampshire. Under the direct management of a man of mature judgment and extensive Western experience, who has come to believe most thoroughly in New England agriculture and the possibilities of farming in his native town, here are twelve hundred acres devoted to grass and potato raising in connection with the maintenance of a milk-producing dairy herd. Under a plan of management which might be classed as both intensive and extensive, even the pastures of this farm are recipients of fertilizer systematically applied.

A PASTORAL scene in Gilman showing a hill farm, comprising many acres of fertile land, which is carried on in a thoroughly modern and scientific way. Gilman was one of the earlier settled towns of the state and its history is replete with the strong characters of men and women who lived and toiled to establish homes that should reflect, in the days to come, the strength and stability of a virile people.
